MAIESTY

POWER

Courteous Reader,

His noble Prince, whose Storie is here deliuered, seemes to haue had the same aduersitie of fortune in his life and death, which he had at his birth. For as he was destituted of the helpes of nature at his entrance, and was faine to haue his way made into the world with a knife ; so in his life was there continuall imployment of either Sword or Axe ; of that, either at home against his Rebels, or against his enemies abroad ; of this, upon his Nobles, and particularly upon his owne vncles by the mothers side ; of which the Duke of Somerset's case is very remarkable. As his birth was violent, and his reigne troublesome, so was his death premature, & not without suspicion of some practice ;

practice; of which, (besides vulgar rumour,) Cardan in calculating his scheme, seemes to haue some icalous coniecture. For whether he diuined it by his art in Astrology, or apprehended it by the course and carriage of businesse, hee made a dangerous prediction: when hee foresaw, that the King should shortly dye a violent death, and (as he reporteth) fled out of the kingdome, for feare of further danger. Howsoeuer, he was as noble a branch as euer sprung out of the Royall stocke, worthy (if so it had seemed good to God) of a more fauourable birth, a quieter reigne, and a longer life. But as the notable accidents in his tumultuous times doe deserue to be recorded; so doth the King himselfe for his sweet condition, for his minde as innocent as his yeares, for his rare endowments well deserue to be commended to euerm-lasting memory; that he may bee permanent so much the longer in the life of an history, by how much the threed of his naturall life was cut shorter by the Fates. And indeed as he had the birth of Cæsar, so had heeene worthy to haue had the fortune and fame of Cæsar; but a better conclusion. This history is left vs from the pen of a worthy Author, of whom we haue another essay in Henry the fourth. This comes out into the world

To the Reader.

after the death of the father; a Posthumus, and is not like to finde any Patron, but the love and affection of thee, (fauourable Reader) to which I commend it, and thee to God.

K. EDVVARD
THE SIXTH.

EDWARD K. of England the sixth of that name of the Norman Race, was borne at Hampton court the 17 of October 1537. 1537 being the only surviving sonne of K. Henry the 8. by Iane his third wife, daughter to S^r John Seymer Knight. And becaule K. Henry did take her to wife, after the death of Katherine his first wife, from whom he had beene divorced, no question nor conceit was cast, but that this Issue betweene them had right to succede.

All reports do constantly runne, that he was not by naturall passage delivered into the world, but that his mothers body was opened for his birth, and that shee dyed of the incision the fourth day following. After which fort men brought forth, forth, were by the ancient Romanes esteemed fortunate; and commonly proved great enterprisers with happy successe. For so Plinie writeth: Auspiciatus enecta matre nascuntur, sicut Scipio Africanus prior natus. These were called Casones and afterwards Casares as Plinie, Festus Pompeius, Solinus and *Titi*us Probus affirme. Quia caso matris utero in lucem prodys- sent.

In this manner was Caso Fabius borne, whom Livy reporteth to have beene thrice Consull; first with Lucius Amilius, next with Sp. Furius, and thirdly with T. Virginus. Thus also was Scipio borne, who by reason of his braue atchievements in Affricke, was surnamed; Scipio Africanus prior. But in that Plinie affirmeth, that he was the first who was called Cesar, à caso matris utero, he seemeth to have made a slippe. For before him and somewhat before the warres with the Samnites, one Claudius was surnamed Cesar, because he was in that fashion brought into the world.

In a nient times these births were esteemed sacred to Apollo, as Servius noteth out of these words in Virgill.

*Inde Lycham ferit exectum cum matre perempta,

And therefore Æsculapius because he was ripped from his mothers wombe, was feigned to be the sonne of Apollo; as Servius vpon another place of Virgill hath observed. For this cause also in the ancient state of Rome, things consecrated to Apollo, were kept by the familie of the Casars. That Iulius Cesar was so borne it is an vncontrouled Report. But that he was the first of the familie of Casars, who was so either named or borne. It is a thicke mistie error supported chiefly by some men of excellent iudgement in their owne professions, but childishly vnskillfull in any thing besides. Plinie writeth that his Father was surnamed Cesar; who having borne the office of Prator, determined his life by suddaine death.

What would haue beene either the fortunes or endeavours of K. EDWARD he never attained to yeares of prooffe. Assuredly both for the time of his age and raigne, he is rather to bee admired then commended, whereby he raised an high expectation for times to ensue. In one point hee was like the like borne Julius Caesar. For as Caesar in the middest of his greatest actions, wrote an exact and curious Commentary of all his notable enterprises by Armes. So this Edward during all the time of his Raigne, but most especially towards the end, kept a most iudicious Iournall of all the most principall passages of the affaires of his estate. These memorials written with K. Edwards hand (which now shall be the ground of this historie) were imparted vnto me by the great Treasurer of English antiquities, S. Robert Cotton Knight Baronet, who as he hath beene a most industrious, both collector and conseruer of choice peeces in that kinde, so is he most ingenuously free, to communicate the vse of them to others.

This young Prince was brought vp among nurses, vntill he arriued to the age of sixe yeares, when he had passed this weake and sappie age, he was committed to *D^r Cox*e, who after was his Almoner, & M. Iohn Cheeke men of meane birth, But so well esteemed for virtue and learning by reason of the place of their employment that they might well be said to be borne of themselves. These having equall authority for instruction of the young Prince and well agreeing bare equall stroake in diuers faculties. *D^r Cox*e for knowledge of Diuinity, Philosophy and gravitie of manners; M^r Cheeke for eloquence in the Latine and Greeke tongues. But for other sufficiencies (so farre as it appears by the bookes which hee wrote) Pedantique enough. Others also were appointed to acquaint him with the vse of the most respected forraigne languages, all iointly endeavouring to infuse into him knowledge and vertue by some mixture of honest delight.

Vnder these teachers the Prince thrived so well that in short time he spake the French tongue perfectly. In the Latine tongue he could declaime vpon the suddaine no lesse both readily and purely then many who were reputed amongst mongst the most learned of these times. He attained not only commendable knowledge but speech in the Greeke, Spanish and Italian languages: having alwaies great iudgment in measuring his words by his matter: his speech being alike both fluent and weightie, such as best becomed a Prince, as for naturall Philosophie, for Logicke, Musicke, Astronomie, and other liberall sciences his perfections were such that the great Italian Philosopher Cardane, having tasted him by many conferences and finding him most strongly to encounter his new devised paradoxes in Philosophie, seemed to be astonished betweene admiration and delight, and divulged his abilities to be miraculous. These his acquirements by industrie were exceedingly both enriched and enlarged by many excellent endowments of nature. For in disposition he was milde, gracious and pleasant of an heavenly wit, in body beautifull, but especially in his eies, which seemed to haue a starrie liuelynes and lustre in them, generally hee seemed to be as Cardane reported of him A MIRACLE OF NATURE.

When he was a few moneths about nine yeeres of his age, great preparation was made either for creating or for declaring him to be Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Count Palatine of Chester. In the midst whereof K. Henry his Father ended his life of a dropsie accompanied with a spreading scarre of his thigh. Herevpon Edward Earle of Hartford and S^t. Anthony Browne knight of the order and Master of the horse were forthwith dispatched, by the residue of the counsaile, to the young King then lying at Hartford. These came vnto him and the next day brought him to Enfield, neither with preparation nor traine any more then ordinarie. Here they first declared vnto him and to the Lady Elizabeth his sister, the death of K. Henry their father. Vpon which tidings they both brake forth into such vnforced and vnfeined passions, as it plainly appeared that good nature did worke in them, beyond all other respects. Never was sorrow more sweetly set forth, than in faces seeming rather ther to beautifie their sorrow, then their sorrow to clowde the beautie of their faces. Their young yeares their excellent beauties; their louely and liuely entercchange of complaints in such sort graced their grieffe: as the most yron eies at that time present were drawne thereby into societie of their Teares.

The next day following being the last of Ianuarie the young king advanced towards London. The Earle of Hartford riding next before him and S^t Anthony Browne behind. The same day he was proclaimed King and his lodging was prepared within the Tower. He there was received by the Constable and Lieutenant on horse backe without the gates, and vpon the bridge next the Ward-gate by all the chiefe Lords to his counsaile. These attended him to his chamber of preface and there sware allegiance vnto him.

Here he remained about three weekes, and in the meane time the counsaile appointed vnto him by his Fathers will dayly fate for ordering the affaires of the Kingdome. Among these the Earle of Hartford was elected and forthwith proclaimed protector of the Realme, and gouernour of the kings person vntill he should accomplish the age of eightene yeares. To this office he was deemed most fit, for that he was the kings vnckle by the Mothers side, very neere vnto him in blood, but yet of no capacitie to succcede; by reason whereof his naturall affection and durie was lesse easie to be over-carried by Ambition. A few daies after the Lord Protector knighted the king within the Tower, and immediately the king stood vp vnder his cloath of estate, tooke the sword from the Lord Protector and dubbed the Lord Maior of London knight. Herehence ensued diuerse other advancements in honour. For S^t Edward Seymer Lord Protector and Earle of Hartford, was created Duke of Somerset. The Lord William Parre Earle of Essex was proclaimed Marquis of Northampton. S^t Thomas Seymer the kings vnckle was made Lord of Sudley and high Admirall of England. S^t Richard Rich was made Lord Rich. S^t William Willoughby by Lord Willoughby of Parreham, and Sir Edmund Sheffield; Lord Sheffield of Buterwike. And because high title of honour were in that time of the Kings minority sparingly granted because dignity then waited vpon desert, which caused it againe to be waited on by respect, every of these testified for others, that it was the pleasure of the Kings Father before his death, that these titles should thus bee conferred.

During this time the body of King Henrie was with honorable solemnities conveyed from London to Sheene and thence to Windsor and there buried within the Colledge. All his officers brake their staues and threw them into the graue, but at their returne to the tower, new staues were delivered vnto them, this solemnitie being finished the King vpon the nineteenth of Febr. 1547. rode in great state from the Tower to the Palace of Westminster, and the day following was crowned by the Archbishop of Canterbury assisted with other Bishops and all the chiefe nobilitie of the Realme. About the twenty-ninth yeere of the Empire of Charles the fifth and the 33 of the Raigne of Francis the first of France and in the fifth yeere both of the raigne and age of Marie Queene of Scotland.

The same day a generall pardon was granted to all persons as it hath beene vsuall at coronations. But by some envious oppositions or for some other causes vnkowne fixe onlie were excepted. The Duke of Northfolke, Cardinall Poole, Edward le Courtney eldest sonne to the Marquesse of Excester, Doctor Pates, Master Fortescue and Master Throgmorton. But they overlived that envie and had their pardons afterwards in the first yeere of the Raigne of Queene Marie. A few daies after the Earle of Southampton Lord Chancellor of England, for being opinatiue (as it was reported, and obstinately opposite to the rest of the Lords in matters of counsaile, was removed both from his office of being Chancellor, and from his place and authority in counsaile; and the great seale was delivered to Sir William Pawlet Lord St. Iohn, who was Lord great Master of the Kings household. But this wound of disgrace never left bleeding, vntill it was stopped by the Protectors fall.

It is certaine that from the first entrance of this King, to his raigne never was King either more loving to others, or better beloved generally of all. The one whereof proceeded from the goodnes of his disposition, the other from many graces and vertues illustrious in him, for besides his excellent beauty and modestie becomming a Prince, besides his sweet humanity the very life of mortall condition, besides a naturall disposition to all literature, whereto he seemed rather borne then instructed, many noble and high virtues sparkled in him, especially Clemencie, Courage, Care, and knowledge in affaires of state.

To Clemencie he was much enclined, especially in matters of blood, and most especially if it were for Religion, a vertue so much the more esteemed, by how much it had beene lesse vsed before, insonmuch that albeit hee was most earnestly affected to that religion wherein hee had beene brought vp, yet none were executed in his time for other religion, but only two blasphemous Heretickes, Ioane Butcher and George a Dutchman.

And when Ioane Butcher was to be burned, all the counsaile could not procure him to set his hand to the warrant. Wherefore they employed Thomas Crammer Archbishop of Canterbury to deale privatly with him for his subscription. But the King remained firme both in reason and resolution, affirming that he would not driue her headlong to the Diuell, but because Heretickes for the most part haue a straine of madnesse, he thought it best to apply her with some corporall chastisements which with respite of time might happily reduce her to good order. The Archbishop was violent both by perswasions and entreaties, and when with meere importunity he had prevailed. The King in subscribing his name said, that he would lay all the charge thereof vpon the Archbishop before God. Not many yeares passed, but this Archbishop also felt the smart of the fire, and it may be that by his importunity for bloud, hee did offend, for a good thing is not good if it be immoderatelie desired or done.

His courage did appeare in the great delight he tooke in representations of Battailles, Skirmishes, Assaults, and of all kinde of military exercises, his iudgment was great either for errors or fine contriuances in the field. And no actions of Armes were executed in his time, but he would perfectly vnderstand, by what aduantages on the one side or ouersights on the other the euent succeeded. He tooke great pleasure in exercises of actiuitie whereto he much trained his seruants. And to that end he often appointed challenges among them for wrestling, leaping, running, riding, shooting at rouses, and at rounds and such like games, and at riding and shooting, would sometimes be of one of the sides. He had 100 archiers of his ordinary guard, who once mustering before him shot two arrowes euery man together against an inch board of well seasoned timber. All stroke through the board, and their arrowes stucke in another board behind, and diuers pierced both the boards; generally none might be of his guard, but besides of tall and comely stature, such as were either good archers or wraistlers or casters of the barre or leapers or runners or of some other man-like qualitie. He was exceeding skilfull in fortifications, and bestowed great cost in strengthening Calleis, Berwicke, and other parts thereabout, He knew all the principall ports in England, Scotland, Ireland, France, and other countries not farre distant, how they lay, when the tyde serued, what vessels of burthen they could receiue and what windes serued for entrance.

Touching his care and knowledge in affaires of state, nothing was more conspicuous in him. He was much conversant amongst his counsaile, and would well vnderstand what matters passed their iudgments, and vpon what grounds. In matters discoursed by them, he would often encounter their reasons, and adde most liuely reasons of his owne. In so much that at last they made an order that no matters of weight, should be debated vnlesse he were present. Admirable he was to collect the speeches and opinions of many, and to draw their differences to a true head, alwaies bending himselfe rather iudiciously to resoluē, then by doubts and distinctions to perplex a businesse, he had a chest whereof he alwaies carryed the key about him, for keeping record of such matters as were concluded by his counsaile. And embracing businesse for part of his solace, hee appointed set times with Doctor Cox Master of his Requests for speeding poore mens causes without tedious attendance or delay. Of all the Magistrates Iustices and Gentlemen of sort within his realme, he knew their names, their housekeeping, their religion and manner of life. Hee was skilfull in the exchange beyond the seas, and in all the circumstances and practises thereof. And so was he both skilfull and provident in matters of the Mint at home. To Embassadors hee would giue answer vpon the suddaine and touch both orderly and fully vpon every part of their orations, to the delight and admiration of all the hearers. He much frequented sermons and penned notes with his owne hand, his notes hee cyphered with greeke characters to the end that they who waited on him should not read them. His disports were ingenuous and man-like whereby he alwaies learned somewhat. And yet as well from these as from his businesses of state, he dayly reserved some houres for his private studies and exercises with his Teachers. These endeavours fell vpon so excellent a capacitie that in every short distance of time, he made incredible increase both in learning and experience of affaires and consequentlie in loue of all men.

Presently after that he was settled in his government, D^r Wotton the kings Embassador resident with the Queene Dowager of Hungarie, regent of the Low Countries vnder the Emperor was discharged of that attendance and addressed to the Emperors court, there to reside Embassador for the king instead of Doctor Bonner Bishop of London, and of Sir Fran- cis Bryan who were called home. He was furnished with instructions that being first informed from the former Embassadors as wel of the general state of the Emperours court as of such particuler intelligēces as might serue to advāce the kings intentions he should deale with the Emperor to declare al Scots for his enemies, except such as should be friends to the King, which should appeare by his safe conduct. That because it had bin agreed betweene the Emperor and the late K. of England, that the yeare next ensuing they should withioyne forces, inuade the Territories of the French King, he should moue the Emperor to aduise of some order and forme for those proceedings. That whereas the Duke of Lorraine had bin late before at the Emperors court, and made some ouerture for peace or truce, betweene the Emperour and the French King, he should be informed by St Francis Bryan of the whole estate of that businesse and awaite opportunity to put the Emperor in remembrance, that it had beene couenanted betweene him and the King of England, that neither of them should treat of peace or truce with the French King, or any other common enemy without consent of the other, and that the King of England had well obserued that article in refusing to giue eare to the French ambassador making ouerture for such a treatise, That whereas it had beene agreed betweene him and the King of England, that either of them should send certaine ships to sea well manned and apparelled for fight, which all that yeere had beene performed by the king, whereas the Emperour shifted the default vpon his officers, in case he should not cause the said Navy to be forthwith furnished, he should awaite occasion to sollicite the same. Lastly that he should carry a nimble eare as well touching any variation in all these matters, as for other occurrences in France, Spaine, Italie, Almaine, and thereof advertise the king.

But notwithstanding all these cautions and preventions of peace, or truce betweene the Emperour and the French, the king of England finding the Emperour slow in his performances and much suspecting his secret ends entertained a treatie of peace with France, but secretly and a farre off, and to bee governed as occasions should vary, and in regard hereof agreement was made, that all ships and goods which had bin surpris'd at sea by the English vpon the French, or by the French vpon the English since the beginning of that treatie should be freely discharged. And albeit the English had great aduantage in value of reprisalls, as being alwaies both more strong and actiue at sea, yet the king by his proclamation commanded that forthwith restitution should be made.

Hostility being thus suspended with France, preparation was made for warres against Scotland, the occasion whereof did thus arise.

MARY STYWARD sole daughter & heire to James the 5. King of Scots began her raigne ouer the Realme of Scotland vpon the 18 of December 1542, being then not about 7 daies olde, so as the Sunne no sooner almost saw her an infant then a Queene and no sooner was shee a Queene, but she was desired of Henry then King of England, to be assured in marriage to Prince Edward his only sonne, being then not much about 6 yeares of age. Vpon this ouerture the gouernor of Scotland assembled the nobility of the Realme at Edenburgh, where after much debatement of the comodities or discommodities like to ensue, they concluded in the end that in March then next ensuing a Parliament should be held to giue perfection and forme to that businesse.

In the meane time S. Ralph Sadler knight was sent ambassador from England to the Gouernor and other Lords of Scotland, who followed his charge with so good diligence and advice that in the same parliament, authority was giuen to William Earle of Glancorne, S. George Douglass, S. William Hamilton, S. James Leirmouth, knights, and to one of the secretaries of state to conclude this marriage. These commissioners came into England with whom before the end of Iulie, the same yeere all covenants were concluded, instruments of the contract of marriage interchangeably sealed and sworne, and a peace established for ten yeares, which time expired both the Prince and the Queene should be of age to consent.

The French King all this time was so entertained with warres against the Emperor that he had no sence of these proceedings, but when he understood that these agreements were passed as well for marriage as for peace he bent his best endeavour to dissolue them both. First with intention to impeach both the greatnesse and strength of the English nation; after with desire to winne this marriage for Francis who afterwards was King of France. To this purpose the French K. sent for Mathew Earle of Levenoxe, who then serued vnder his pay in Italie and furnished him with mony, forces, and friends, and aboue all with many encouragements to take vpon him brauely the honour of his house, and Ancestors, to remoue the Earle of Arraine from the Regency of Scotland, and to reverse such pactions as he had made. The Earle at his first arrivall in Scotland was ioyfully received, as a man most engaged in domestickall factions. He alwaies vsed curtesie and modestie disliked of none, sometimes sociablenes and fellowship well liked by many, generally he was honoured by his nation and well reputed by strangers, in favour of him the Pope sent the Patriarch of Apulia his Legat into Scotland, who in the Popes name did faithfully assure, that both forces & mony should be sent into Scotland to resist the English. Hee drew the greatest of the Cleargie on his side who were most powerfull to draw on others. On the other side the king was not negligent to support his party with supplies, whereby great troubles ensued in Scotland, which fell not within the times that I haue in hand.

In the end the Earle of Arraine abandoned the king of England, and applyed himselfe only to the French by reason whereof, the Regencie was confirmed to him which otherwise he had bin vpon adventure to loose. And as the Earle of Arraine did forsake the English and adioine to the French, so the Earle of Levenoxe, being forsaken by the French applied his his service wholly to the English, which did not only continue but much encrease the calamities of Scotland, during the time of king Henries raigne.

King Henrie at the time of his death gaue a speciall charge to the Lords of his counsaile, that they should omit no endeavours whereby the said marriage might be procured to take effect; Herevpon they pursued this quarrell in the same state the king left it. But before they attempted any thing by Armes, the Lord Protector assailed the Scottish nobility with a friendly letter, Herein he remembred them of the promises, scales, and oathes, which by publike authority had passed for concluding this marriage, that these being religious bonds betwixt God and their soules, could not by any politike act of state be dissolved, vntill their Queene should attaine vnto yeares of dissent. Hee farther added that the providence of God did then manifestly declare it selfe, in that the male princes of Scotland failing the kingdome was left to a daughter, and in that King Henry left only one sonne to succeed. That these two princes were agreeable both for yeares and princely qualities, to bee ioyned in marriage, and thereby to knit both Realmes into one. That this vnion as it was like to bee both easily done, & of firme continuance, so would it be both profitable and honourable to both the Realmes. That both the easinesse and firmnes might be coniectured, for that both people are of the same language, of like habit and fashion, of like qualitie and condition of life, of one climate, not only annexed entirely together, but severed fro all the world besides. For as these are sure arguments that both descended from one originall, and had bin vnder one government, so (by reason that likenes is a great cause of liking and of loue,) they would be most forceable meanes both to ioine and to hold them in one body againe, that the profit would rise by extinguishing warres betweene the two nations, by reason whereof in former times victories abroad haue bin impeached, invasions and seditions occasioned, the confines of both Realmes laid wast or else made a nurserie of rapines, robberies, and murders, the inner parts often deeply pierced, and made a wretched spectacle to all eyes of humanity and pittie. That the honour of both Realmes would encrease as well in regard of the countries sufficient to furnish not only the necessities but the moderate pleasures of this life : as also of the people great in multitude, in bodies able, assured in minde not only for the safetie, but the glory of their common state. That hereby would follow assurance of defence, strength to enterprize, ease in sustaining publike burthens and charge. That herein the English desired no preheminance, but offered equalitie both in liberty and privileged, and in capacitie of offices and employments, and to that end the name of Brittaines should be assumed indifferent to both nations. That this would be the accomplishment of their common felicitie, in case by their evill either desire or advice they suffered not the occasion to be lost.

The authority and reasons of this letter weighed much with persons of most weighty iudgements, but others more powerful in that state partly vpon vaine hope in regard of the young yeares of the king, partly vpon feare of alteration in religion, and partly in favour of their ancient amitie with the French, and doubting to be brought vnder by the English, were altogether carryed another way, yet they dispatched an Embassador into England, but neither was any thing done, neither do I finde what was propounded to haue bin done.

Herevpon diverse hostilities began to be practised. And first a small ship of the kings called the Penfie hovering at sea, was assailed by the Lyon a principall shippe of Scotland. The fight began farre off and slow, but when they approached, it grew very furious, wherein the Penfie so applyed her shot, that therewith the Lions ore loope was broken, her sailes and tacklings torne : and lastly, shee was boarded and taken. But as shee was brought for England, shee was cast away by tempest and negligence neere Harewich haven, and most of her men perished with her. I would not haue staide vpon this small adventure, but that it seemed a presage to the succeeding warre, wherein the English acquired a glorious victorie, but lost the fruit thereof, by reason of their stormie disorders at home.

Many such small actions were enterprised dayly, which were but scattering drops in regard of the great tempest which did ensue. For in the meane season an armie was prepared for invasion of Scotland, vnder the fortune and commande of the Lord Protector. The souldiers first assembled at Newcastle and were there mustred by the Earle of Warwicke. Here they sojourned three daies in which time the kings fleete arrived, consisting of 65. Bottomes, whereof one galley and 34. tall ships were well appointed for fight, the residue served for carriage of munition and victuals. Of this fleete Edward Lord Clinton was Admirall, and Sir William Woodhouse his Viceadmirall, in this time also a generall muster was taken and order appointed for the March.

In the whole armie were betweene 12. and 1300 thousand foot, 1300 men at Armes, 2800 light horse, being such men for their goodly personages, their ready horses their braue apparell, their armour and weapons, as never before was an armie set forth into those parts in all points better appointed. The Lord Protector being Generall, represented the person and Maiestie of the king. The Earle of Warwicke was Lieutenant generall. The Lord Gray of Uilston was Marshall of the field, and captaine generall of the horsemen. Sir Ralph Vane Lieutenant of all the men at Armes and Dimilances, Sir Ralph Sadler was generall Treasurer, other gentlemen had their particuler charges. But vpon the Generall and the Earle of Warwicke both the hopes and hazards of the maine adventure did wholly turne. And because much shalbe said of these two hereafter, because during the raigne of king Edward, they were the principall actors in every sceane, I will briefly declare both what persons, and of what demerits at that time they were.

Edward Seymer Duke of Somerset, Lord Generall was a man little esteemed either for wisdom or personage, or courage in armes. But being in favour with king Henry and by him much imployed, was alwaies observed to be both faithfull and fortunate as well in giving advise, as in managing a charge. About five yeares before hee being Warden of the Marches against Scotland, the invasion of James the 5. was by his direction encountred, and broken at Solome Mosse, whereof diverse of the Scottish nobility were taken prisoners. The yeare next after, hee and the Earle of Warwicke with a handfull of men to speake of, fired Lieth and Ederburgh, and returned by a leasurely march 44 miles through the body of Scotland. The yeare next ensuing he invaded the Scottish borders, wasted Tinedale & the marches and deformed the country with ruine and spoile. The yeare then next following, being appointed to view the fortifications vpon the marches of Caleis, he not only did that, but with the hardy approach of 7000 English men raised an armie of 21000 French, encamped over the River before Bulleine, wanne their ordinance, carriage, treasure and tents, with the losse only of one man, and returned from thence by land to Guisnes, wan in his way within shot and rescue of Arde the castle of Ouing, comonly called the red pile. The yeare next ensuing this, he invaded & spoiled Picardy, began the forces of Newhaven, Blacknesse and Bullingberge, and so well applyed his endeavours, that in a few weekes and before his departure they were made terrible, vpon these and other like successes, his succeeding fortunes were esteemed alwaies rather new, then strange, and his onlie presence was reputed a sufficient surety for an army, and yet did he never rise hereby, either into haughtines in himselfe, or contempt of others, but remained courteous & affable, choosing a course least subiect to envie, betweene stiffe stubbornnes and filthy flattery, never aspiring higher then to be the second person in state.

John Dudley Earle of Warwicke was a man of ancient nobilitie, comely in stature and countenance, but of little gravitie or abstinence in pleasures, yea sometimes almost dissolute, which was not much regarded, if in a time when vices began to grow into fashion, a great man was not over severe. He was of a great spirit and highly aspiring, not forbearing to make any mischief the meanes for attaining his ambitious endes. Hereto his good wit and pleasant speeches were al tog ther serviceable, having the art also by emptie promises and threats to draw others to his purpose, in matters of armes he was both skilfull and industrious, and as well in fore-sight as resolution present and great. Being made L. Lieutenant of Bulloine, when it was first taken by the English, the walls sore beaten & shaken, and in verry truth scarce maintaineable, he defended the place against the Dolphine whose armie was accounted to consist of 52000 men. And when the Dolphine had entred the base towne, not without slaughter of divers of the English, by a braue sally he cast out the French againe with the losse of aboute 800 of their men esteemed the best souldiours in France. The yeare next ensuing when the French had a great flecte at sea for invasion of England, he was appointed Admirall and presented battaile to the French Navy, which they refused and returned home with all their threats and cost in vaine. Herevpon he landed 5000 men in France, fired *Tre-por*t, and diverse villages there abouts & returned to his ships with the losse only of one man. To say truth for enterprises by armes, he was the Minion of that time, so as few things he attempted, but he atchieued with honour, which made him more proud and ambitious when he had done. Generally he alwaies encreased both in estimation with the king, and authority among the Nobility, doubtfull whether by fatall destinie to the state, or whether by his vertues, or at least by his appearances of vertues.

Now the Generall in this voyage was diligent and careful, and to perfect all practises which might serue to advance the adventure, as to giue good contentment to all the Souldiers. These also were of good confidence and cheere, as well out of their owne courage, as for the skill, valour, and fortune of their commanders. And first every souldier was commanded to take with him provision for foure daies, and so were let out of Berwicke and encamped about two flight shootes off the towne vpon the sea side towards Scotland. The Lord Clynton also put to sea with his fleete, alwaies holding his course With the army to relieue them if neede should require. Here proclamation was made in three parts of the field, declaring the causes of this iourney, and offering not only peace, but loue and rewards to all such as would either advance or fauour the marriage beewene the two princes. Hereof it was conceiued that the Scots had good intelligence, hauing some factors doubtlesse at this mart, albeit, (as wisdome was) they did not openly trade.

The next day they began to march, wherein the Lord Gray and Sir Francis Bryan led aboue 800 lighthorsemen as a scout a mile or two before the army, aswell to giue advertisement of appearance or approach of enimies as to provide lodging both commodious and safe S^r Francis Bryan was so regardfull of his charge as he neuer disposed any matter of weight, but first he acquainted the Generall therewith, neither did he at any time forsake his saddle, vntill the army were quartered, and seated in such order, as if any alarme should be giuen, the horsemen might issue forth without disturbance of the foote, and the Avantguard without shuffling with the battaile or Arriere, next to the light horsemen followed the Avantguard, in number betweene 3 and 4000 foote, 100 men at armes and 600 light horsemen led by the Earle of Warwicke. The Battaile followed consisting of about 6000 foote, 600 men at armes, and about 1000 light horsemen conducted, by the Lord Generall himselfe. Lastly followed the Arrier wherein were betweene 3 and 4000 foote, 100 men at armes and 600 light horse vnder the conduct of the Lord Dacres a liuely aged gentleman no lesse serled in experience then in yeares. vpon one wing the Artillery was drawn being 16 peeces, euery peece hauing his guard of pioners to plain the waies, the other wing was made by men at armes and demolances for the Avantguard and halfe the battaile riding about two flight shoote from their side. The other halfe of the battaile and the whole flancke of the Arrier was cloased by the carriages being 900 cartes, besides waggons. The residue of the men at armes and Demilances marched behinde.

In this order both beautifull and firme they marched two daies vsing no hostility, least peace thereby might happily be hindred. The second day they arrived at a place called the Peathes, a valley stretching towards the sea 6 miles in length, about 20 score in breadth aboue, and 5 score in the bottome wherein runnes a little riuer. The bankes are so steepe on either side, that the passage is not direct, but by paths leading sloopewise, which being many the Place is therevpon called the Peathes. It was giuen forth in the army that here the Scots prepared to resist them, howbeit no forces appeared. Only the Pathes were cut in diuers places with trauese trenches, which much encumbred the carriages vntill the Pioners had leveld them againe. Assuredly a small power ioyned to the advantage of the place might haue troubled the English very much. For albeit no resistance was made yet the English had much to doe in surmounting the naturall difficulties of the place; the greatest part of one day.

Passage being made the generall summoned three castles that were neere. One desperate of succor and not desirous to dispute the diffence presently yeelded, but two stood vpon their aduenture. So the Cannon was planted a breach made and the place entered, but, then the moderation of the Generall was both vnusuaill and vunexpected, insparing the Defendants liues, for it hath bin a long observed law of the field. That if a small company of better courage then iudgment, will contrary to all military discipline maintaine a feeble place against royall forces, if they will offer to impeach the purposes of an army, which they haue no reason to thinke themselves able to resist, after battery presented they put themselves out of all ordinary expectation of mercy and so

They made petition that they might not presently be slaine; but haue some time to recommend their soules to God, and afterwards be hanged, this respite being first obtained their pardon did more easily ensue.

Vpon the first newes of the approaches of the English and all truths enlarged by report. The Gouernor of Scotland was somewhat appalled, as neither furnished at that time with foraine aide, nor much trusting his forces at home yet resuming his accustomed courage well acquainted with both fortunes, he sent his heralds through all parts of the realme, and commanded the firecrosse to be carried (an ancient custome in cases of importance) namely two firebrands set in fashion of a crosse, and pitched vpon the point of a speare, therewith proclamation to be made that all men aboue 16 yeares of age, and vnder 60 should resort forthwith to Muscleborough with convenient provision of victuals with them.

Herevpon they flocked to the place in so great multitudes that it was thought fit not only to stay further resort, but making choice of the most serviceable, to discharge diuers of the rest.

Now as the English directed their way towards the place where they vnderstood the Scots assembled, they came to a riuer called Lymne crossed with a bridge of stone. The horsemen and carriages passed through the water, the foote men ouer the bridg, which because it was narrow the army was long in setting ouer, The Avantguard marched forth and the battaile followed, but as the Arriere was passing ouer, a very thicke mist did arise. The Earle of Warwicke hauing before espyed certaine plumpes of Scottish horsemen ranging the field returned towards the Arriere to prevent such danger as the thickeesse of the mist, the neerenes of the enemy, and the disarray occasioned by the narrownes of the bridg might cast vpon them. The Scots coniecturing (as it was) that some personage of honor staied to haue a view of the Arriere, called to the english to know if any noble man were neere, for that one whom they named (well knowne to be of honourable condition) would present himselfe to the Generall in case he might safely be conducted. Certaine young souldiers not vfed to such traines made rash and suddaine answere that the Earle of Warwicke was neere, vnder whose protection he might be assured. Herevpon they passed the water placed 200 of their prickers behinde a hiliocke, and with 40 more cast about to finde the Earle. Now the Earle espying 6. or 7. of them scattered neere the army and taking them to be of the English sent one to command them to their Arrais, and to that end himselfe rode an easy pace towards them followed only with 10 or 12 on horsebacke. He that had beene sent before was so heedlesse either to obserue, or to aduertise what they were, that the Earle did not discouer them to be enemies vntill he was in the midst among them.

Certainely a commander should not carelesly cast himselfe into danger, but when either vpon necessity or misadventure he falleth into it, it much aduanceth both his reputation and enterprise if brauely he behaue himselfe. Now the Earle espying where he was gaue so rude a charge vpon a capitaine of the Scots named Dandy Care, that he forced him to turne, and chased him about 12 score at the lances point. Herewith the residue retyred deceitfully towards the place of their Ambush, from whence issued about 60 more. Then the Earle gathered his small company about him, and with good countenance maintained the fight. But the enemy in the end whether perceiuing some succors advancing from the army where the Alarme was then taken, or whether intending to draw the English further into their Ambush, turned away an easy pace. The Earle forbad his men from following, fearing a greater ambush behind the hill as in truth there was. At his returne he was receiued with great applause by the English souldiers, for that he did so well acquit himselfe in the danger, wherein to by error and not by rashnes he had bin carryed. One of his men was slaine, another hurt in the buttocke, a third named Vane so grieuously hewne that many thousands haue dyed of lesse then halfe his hurts, whereof notwithstanding, he was cured afterwards; of the Scots 3 were taken prisoners and presented to the generall by the Earle, of whom one had receiued many great entertainments and curtesies in England.

I may happely be thought tedious in setting downe these occurrences which may seeme small. But besides that in actions of armes small matters are many times of very great moment, especially when they serue to raise an opinion of commanders, I intend to describe this battaile fully, not to derogate thereby any thing from the one nation, or to arrogate to the other. For what honor riseth vpon euent of a battaile, when oftentimes the smallest accident ouerthroweth a side? And when victory doth more often fall, by error of the vanquished then by valor of the victorious. But my purpose is to make it appeare what myseries both nations haue avoided, and what quietnesse and security they haue attained by their peaceable union, when as either of them being able to bring such forces into the field for their mutuall ruine, they may now doe the like for their common either glory or necessity. Againe this battaile being partially discrib'd described heretofore by the writers of either nation and not without vncivill termes, I will now set it forth so indifferently and fairely as I can. Lastly this battaile is not slightly to be slipped ouer, being the last (wherein I pray that I may prophesie truly (that was or euer shall be strooke betweene the two nations. But I returne to my purpose.

Now the Scottish horsemen began to houer much vpon the English army, and to come pricking about them sometimes within the length of their staues, vsing someliberty of language to draw the English from their strength. But the Generall of the English knowing right well, that the Scots were expert in tumultuous fights, restrained his horse from falling forth, and maintained a close march vntill they came to Salt Preston by the Frith. Here they encamped within view of the Scottish army, little more then two miles distant from them. About a mile from the English another way, the Scottish horsemen were very busy, vpon a hill, and emboldened much partly vpon their former approaches, and partly by the neerenesse of their army, but cheifly vpon an opinion which they conceiued, that the English horsemen were young and vnskilfull, and easy to be dealt with, came vpon the English with encreased troopes, to the number of 1200 besides 500 foote which lay in ambush behind the hill. The Lord Gray and Sir Francis Bryan impatient of braueries obtained leaue of the Generall a little to assay them, and so as they came scattered vpon the spurre within a stones cast of the English and were beginning to wheele about the Lord Gray with some troopes of lighthorsemen charged them home. These were forthwith seconded by certaine numbers of dimilances and both backed with about 1000 men at armes. The Scots meant not to depart before they had done their errand, wherefore turning their faces boldly maintained the fight, three houres and more. In the end ouerlaied with numbers they were put to flight and chased almost to the edge of their campe, in this fight the chiefeſt force of the Scottiſh horſemen was defeated, to their great diſadvantage afterwards. The Lord Hume by a fall from his horſe loſt his life. His ſonne and heire with two Preiſts and 6 gentlemen were taken priſoners, and about 1300 ſlaine. Of the Engliſh one Spaniſh hackbutter was hurt, and three captaines of the light horſe, by vnadviſed purſuite were taken priſoners.

The day next following the Lord Generall and the Earle of Warwicke rode towards the place where the Scottiſh army lay to view the manner of their encamping, as they were returned an herald and a trumpeter from the Scots overtooke them, and hauing obtained audience the Herald beganne, That he was ſent from the Lord Governor of Scotland partly to enquire of priſoners, but cheifly to make offer, that becauſe he was deſirous to auidoie not only profuſion but the leaſt effuſion of Chriſtian blood, and for that the Engliſh had not done any unmanlike outrage or ſpoile, he was content they might returne, and ſhould haue his ſafe conduct for their peaceable paſſage.

Then the Trumpeter, that the Lord Huntly his maſter ſent meſſage by him, that aſwell for breefe expedition, as to ſpare expence of chriſtian blood, he would fight vpon the whole quarrell either with 20 againſt 20 or with 10 againſt 10 or more particularly by ſingle combate betweene the Lord Generall and himſelfe, which in regard the Scots had advantage both for number and freſhneſſe of men, in regard alſo that for ſupply, both for proviſion and ſuccors they were at home, he eſteemed an honourable and charitable offer.

To the Herald the Lord Generall answered that as his comming was not with purpoſe or deſire to endamage their Realme, as he was there, he would neither intreat nor accept of him leaue to depart, but would meaſure his marches in advancing or retiring, as his owne iudgment, guided by advice of his counſaile ſhould deeme expedient.

To the Trumpeter he returned answer, that the L. Huntley his master was a young gentleman full of free courage, but more desirous of glory then indicious, as it seemed, how to win it. That for number of Combatants it was not in his power to conclude a bargaine, but was to employ all the forces put under his charge to the best advantage that he could, that in case this were a particular quarrell betweene the Governour and him, he would not refuse a particular combat, but being a difference betweene the 2 Kingdomes, it was neither fit, nor in his power either to undertake the adventure upon his owne fortune, or bearing a publike charge to hazard himselfe against a man of private condition.

Then the Earle of Warwicke said, I marvaile Trumpeter that thy master would make his challenge so fond, as he might well knowe it could not be accepted. For tell mee Trumpeter, can he thinke it fit, that he, to whose charge is committed the command of all this Army abroad, and at home the Kings person and protection of all his Realmes, should undertake a combat with a particular man. But he might have found others his equals amongst us, by whom he might have beene assured that he should be answered? And (therewith turning his speech to the L. Generall) under your Graces favour, I accept the challenge. And bring me word Trumpeter that thy master will performe with mee as thou hast said, and thou shalt have 100 crownes for thy travaile.

Nay, answered the L. Generall, you have a great charge in the Army, which upon a private mans challenge you must not abandon. But Herault tell the L. Governor, and the L. Huntley, That we have entred your country with a sober company (for so the Scots terme a thing that is meane) your army is both great and fresh, but let them appeare upon indifferent ground, and assuredly they shall have fighting enough. And bring me word Herault that they will so doe, and I will reward thee with 1000 crownes.

This Earle of Huntley was a man young, bold, adventurous, of very good resolution and skill in Armes. But this challenge challenge was so farre beyond the point both of discretion and honor, that the English that knew his noble spirit, did beleue that his name was therein abused, which hee manifested to be true by disavowing it openly afterwards. For it is not fit that a man should abandon his publike charge to vndertake both the office and danger of a private Souldier. And therefore the like challenge of Tullus was refused by the commander of the Albanes. For that the contention was not betweene their persons, but between the Citties of Alba and Rome. So Sertorius was refused by Metellus, Antonius by Augustus, and Iohn Emperor of Constantinople by a king of Scythia, So Antonius Caracalla by reason of his often challenges, was esteemed not to be so valiant as vaine. And herevpon the histories of our times forbear not to blame Charles the first, Emperour, Henry the eight, king of England, and Francis the first, king of France, for that they often adventured rather as Souldiers then as Commanders.

But doubtlesse the L. Governour made a most honourable offer, and the rather for that it was conceiued by the English, that he held himselfe no lesse assured of victory then he was of his owne resolution to fight, whereto it seemed that he wanted not good reason, cheifly vpon confidence of his owne forces, and partly vpon expectation of 12 Gallies and 30 ships well appointed out of France to assaile the English at their backs. All the chiefe Captaines yeilded to the same advice of giving battaile, as out of their owne iudgements, because they saw it agreeable to that which the L. Governour had determined. To these the residue attributed so much, that albeit diuerse were of a different opinion, yet they chose rather to condemne their owne vnderstanding then to question theirs.

During this enterparlance the Scots discharged 4 great shots against the English campe, without harme as it happened, but not without breach of the Laws of the field, whereby not only publike messengers are priuiledged to passe without either danger or scorne, but untill they haue discharged their message.

message all hostility should surcease. Howsoever this happened the Generall of the English army vnwilling to bee behind in any equall or honourable offer, sent letters to the L. Governour of Scotland, Wherein he desired him and the residue of the Scottish nobility to consider, That both armies consisted of Christians, to whom nothing should be more deere then peace, nothing more detestable then effusion of humane blood. That the cause of this warre did not proceed from ambition, avarice, or hate, but from desire of perpetuall peace betweene their people and nations, which could no way so firmly be knit as by knitting their Princes together in marriage. That many other respects, set aside their King for his birth, his yeares, his royall estate, his princely personage, education, and qualities was such a marriage for their Queene, that a more convenient could not be found, that in case all the Nobility of Scotland were not of one minde. The English would bee content that their Queene should bee brought up amongst them, untill she should be of age to make her owne choice. Provided that in the meane time she should not bee transported to any forraigne country, or any agreement made for any other marriage. That vpon this condition there should be an abstinence of hostility, for all that time, and they would in quiet manner withdraw their army, and repaire all dammages which indifferent Commissioners should adiudge.

No answere was hereto returned, but rumors ran freshly among the Scottish souldiers, that the intention of the English was to take away their Queene by force, and vnder pretence of marriage to reduce the kingdome vnder their dominion, and verily it may seeme almost incredible that all these faire ouertures, made by men well esteemed for honest dealing, could take no place, that nothing could moue the Scots to forsake their distant and heavy helps, and to embrace friends, both ready and at hand. But besides that, the long continued warres betweene the English and the Scots, had then raised invincible ieaiousies and hate, which long continued peace hath since abolished. I doe herein ad-more the vnsearchable working and will of God, by whose inflexible decree the vnion betweene the two Realmes did not then take effect; when by the death of K. Edward it should haue beene of short continuance, (as by the death of Francis the second, the vnion betweene France and Scotland did suddenly dissolue) but was reserued vnto a more peaceable and friendly time, so for a person in whose progeny it hath taken deepe and durable root. And so for that time no conditions of peace being regarded, both sides addressed themselues to their adventure.

The places where the two Armies lay encamped, were divided by the river Eske, the banks whereof were almost so deepe as the bankes of the Peathes mentioned before. The Scots lay so newhat neere the one side, & the English about two miles from the other. The English first raised their Campe, and began to march towards the river Eske, intending to possesse a hill called Vnder-Eske, which commanded the place where their enemies lay. The Scots coniecturing so much, cast their Tents flat vpon the ground, passed the River and mounted the Hill before the English could come neere. Herevpon the English turned aside to another hill called Pinkenclench, which afterwards fell much to their Advantage, as well for that they were then in place to bee ayded by their ships which rode neere in Edenburgh Frith, as also for that they gained thereby the advantage both of winde and Sunne, a great part of the strength of an Army, and lastly for that their enemies were thereby cast into a cruell error.

For no sooner did they espy the English turning from them, but forthwith they were of opinion that they fled towards their shipping. This surmise was first occasioned for that the English ships remoued the day before from Lieth to Muscleborough Frith, which was conceiued to be for taking in their foote and carriages, that the horsemen might with lesse encumbrance and more hast returne backe vpon the spurre. Herevpon they had appointed the same night, (whose darknesse would haue encreased the feare) to haue giuen a camifado vpon the English. But vnderstanding, that they were well entrenched hauing good escout abroad, and sure watch within, they brake that purpose, but vpon this decining of the English from them, the conceit did againe reuiue, not only as a thing desired, but because the English were inferior vnto them in number, and had tra-uailed farre, and were well knowne to grow short in their provisions. Yea when they were discerned to make stand vpon the first ascent of Pinkenclench hill, the coniecture ran that their flight, was only deferred vntill they might couer their disorders by the dead darknesse of the night. Marmalious security and alwaies dangerous, when men will not beleue any bees to be in a hine untill they haue a sharpe sense of their stings.

And thus the Scots heaued vp into high hope of victory, rooke the English fallen for foolish birds fallen into the nette, and seeming to feere nothing more then that they should escape, forlooke their hill and marched into the plaine directly towards the English. Here the Lord Governor put them in remembrance, how they could neuer yet be brought vnder by the English, but were alwaies able either to beate them backe, or to weary them away. He bad them looke vpon themselves and vpon their enimies, themselves dreadfull, their enimies gorgeons and braue, on their side men, on the other spoil, in case either through slownesse or cowardise they did not permit them to escape, who (lo now) already haue began their fight.

The whole army consisted of 35 or 36000 men of whom they made three battaillons. In the Auantgard commanded by the Earle of Angus about 15000 were placed, about 10000 in the battaile, over whom was the Lord Governor and so many in the Arriere, led by the valiant Gordone Earle of Hunsley. Hackbutters they had none, no men at armes but about 2000 horsemen, prickers as they are termed, fitter to make excursions and to chase then to sustaine any any strong charge. The residue were on foote well furnished With Iacke and skull, pike, dagger, bucklers made of boorde, and sliceing swords, broad, thinne and of an excellent temper. Every man had a large kercheife folded twice or thrice about the necke, and many of them had chaines of latten drawne three or foure times along their hoses and doublet sleeues, they had also to affright the enimies horses, big rattles couered with parchment or paper, and small stones within, put vpō staues about three els long. But doubtles the ratling of shot might haue done better service.

The Earle of Angus led the Avantguard with a well measured march, whereupon the Lord Governor commanded him by a messenger to double his pace, thereby to strike some terror vnto the enemy. Himselfe followed with the battaile a good distance behinde, and after came the Arrier well nigh euen with the battaile on the left side, the avantguard was flanked on the right side with 4 or 5 pieces of Artillery drawne by men, and with 400 horsemen prickers on the left. The battaile and Arriere were likewise guarded with Artillery in like sort drawne, and about 4000 Irish Archers brought by the Earle of Argile, serued as a wing to them both, rightly so termed as being the first who began the flight,

The Generall of the English and the Earle of Warwicke were together when the Scots thus abandoned the hill, which they espying gaue thanks to God, holding themselves in good hope of the euent, forthwith they ordered the artillery, and taking a louing leaue departed to their seuerall charge, the Generall to the battaile, where the Kings standard was borne, the Earle to the Avantguard, both on foote, protesting that they would liue or dy with the souldiers, whom also with bold countenance and speech (which serue souldiers for the best eloquence) they put in minde of the honour, their ancestors had acquired, of their own extreme disgrace and danger if they fought not well, that the iustice of their quarrell should not so much encourage as enrage them, being being to revenge the dishonor done to their King, and to chastise the deceitfull dealings of their enimies, that the multitude of their enimies should nothing dismay them, because they who come to maintaine their owne breach of faith, besides that the checke of their consciences much breaketh their spirit, have the omnipotent arme of God most furious against them.

Herewith arose a buzzing noise among them as if it had bin the rustling found of the sea a farre off, euery man addressing himselfe to his office, and encouraging those who were neereest vnto them. The Earle ranged his Avauntguard in Array vpon the side of the hill, expecting vntill the enemy should more neerely approach. The generall after he had ordered his Battaile, parte vpon the hill, and parte vpon the plaine, somewhat distant from the Avantguard on the right side, mounted the hill to the great artillerie, to take a view of both the Armies, and to giue directions as occasions should change. The Arrier stood wide of the battaile vpon the same side, but altogether vpon the plaine. The L. Gray Captaine of the men at Armes, was appointed to stand somewhat distant from the Avantguard on the left side, in such sort as he might take the flanke of the enimie, but was forbidden to charge, vntill the foot of the Avantguard were buckled with them in front, and vntill the battaile should be neere enough for his reliefe.

Now after that the Scots were well aduanced in the field, marching more then an ordinary pace, the great shot from the English ships, and especially from the galley began furiously to scoure among them, whereby the M^r of Grime and diuers others about were tome in peices; especially the wing of the Irish was so grievously either galled or scarred therewith, that (being strangers and in a manner neutralls) they had neither good heart to goe forward, nor good likeing to stand still, nor good assurance to run away. The Lord Gray perceiued this amazement, and conceiued thereby occasion to be ripe, wherevpon when the enemy was not about

about two flight shot from the English avantguard, suddenly and against direction with his men at armes, he charged them on head.

The Scots were then in a fallow field, whereinto the English could not enter, but ouer a crosse ditch and a slough, in passing whereof many of the English horse were plunged and some mired, when with some difficulty and much disorder they had passed this ditch, the ridges of the fallow field lay trauerse, so as the English must crosse them in presenting the charge. Two other disadvantages they had, the enimies pikes were longer then their staues, and their horses were naked without any barbs. For albeit many brought barbes out of England, yet because they expected not in the morning to fight that day, few regarded to put them on.

The Scots confident both in their number, order, and good appointment, did not only abide the English, but with some biting termes provoked them to charge. They cloased and in a manner locked themselves together, shoulder to shoulder, so neere as possibly they could, their pikes they strained in both hands and therewith their buckler in the left, the one end of the pike against the right foote, the other breast high against the enemy. The fore ranke stooped so low as they seemed to kneele, the second ranke close at their backs, crossed their pikes ouer their shoulders, and so did the third and the rest in their order, so as they appeared like the thornie skinne of a hedghogge, and it might be thought impossible to breake them. Notwithstanding the charge was giuen with so well gouerned fury, that the left corner of the Scots battaillon was enforced to giue in, But the Scots did so brauely recouer and acquit themselves, that diuerse of the English horsemen were overthrowne, and the residue so disordered as they could not conueniently fight or fly, and not only iustled & bare downe one another, but in their confused tumbling backe brake a part of the Avantguard on foote. In this encounter 26 of the english English were slaine most part Gentlemen of the best esteem. Divers others lost their horses, and carried away markes that they had beene there. The L. Gray was dangerously hurt with a pike in the mouth, which stricke two inches into his necke. The L. Edward Seymer sonne to the L. Generall lost his horse, and the English Standard was almost lost.

Assuredly albeit encounters betweene horsemen on the one side, and foot on the other are seildome with the extremity of danger, because as horsemen can hardly breake a battaile on foot, so men on foot cannot possibly chase horsemen. Yet heereupon so great was the tumult and feare among the English, that, had not the commanders bin men both of approued courage & skill, or happely had the Scots beene well furnished with men at Armes the army had that day beene vtterly yndone. For an army is commonly like a flocke of fowles when some begin to flie all will follow. But the Lord Gray to repaire his error endeoured with all industrie to vallye his horse: The Lord Generall also mounted on horsebacke and came amongst them both by his presence & aduice to reduce the into order. Sr. Ralph Vane & Sr. Ralph Sadler did memorable service. But especially the Earle of Warwicke who was in greatest danger declared his resolution and judgment to bee most present in reteyning his men both in order and in heart. And hauing cleered his foot from disturbance by the horsemen, hee sent forth before the front of his Avantgard Sr. Peter Mewes Capitaine of all the Hackbutteres on foot, and Sr. Peter Gamboa, a Spaniard Capitaine of 200 Hackbutteres Spanish and Italians on horse. These brought their men to the slough mentioned before, who discharging liuely almost close to the face of the enemy did much amaze them, being also disordered by the late pursuit of the English horsemen, and by spoiling such as they had ouerthrowne. At the backes of these the Archers were placed, who before had marched on the right wing of the Avantguard, and then sent such showers showers of shot ouer the Hackbutters heads, that many bodies of their enimies being but halfe armed, were beaten downe and buried therewith. And besides the Master of the Artillery did visit them sharply with murthering haile-shot from the peeces mounted towards the top of the hill; also the Artillery which flanked the Arriere executed hotly. Lastly the ships were not idle, but especially the galley did play vpon them and plague them very sore.

The Scots being thus applied with shot, and perceiuing the Avantguard of the English to be in good order, neere-ly to approach, & the men at armes to haue recouered their Array, turned their Avantguard somewhat towards the South, to win, as it was thought, some advantage of ground. By this meanes they fell directly on head on the English battaile, wherevpon the Earle of Warwicke addressed his men to take the flanke. The Avantguard of the Scots being thus vpon, and beset with enimies, began a little to retire towards their great battaile, either to be in place to be relieved by them, or happely to draw the English more separate and apart. The Irish Archers espying this and surmising the danger to be greater then it was, suddenly brake vp & committed the lastie of their liues to their nimble footman-ship. After whose example all the rest threw away their weapons, and in headlong hast abandoned the field, not one stroke hauing beene giuen by the English on foot. But then the horsemen comming furiously forward had them very cheap.

The flight was made three waies, some running to Edenburgh, some along the sands towards Lieth, but the most towards Daketh, which way by reason of the marish the English horse were least able to pursue. The chase was giuen from one of the clocke in the afternoone till almost six. It reached fise miles in length, and foure in breadth, all which waies the Scots scattered in their flight Jacks, Swords, Bucklers, Daggers, or whatsoeuer was either cumbersome, or of weight to impeach their hast, yea some cast off their shooes and dublets and fled in their shirts. Divers other devises were practised to avoid or deferre the present danger. Some intreated and offered large ransomes, some being pursued only by one, sodainly turned head and made resistance, by whom many horses were disabled, and some of their horses either slaine or hurt. The Earle of Angus a man of assured both hardinesse and understanding, couched in a furrow and was passed ouer for dead vntill a horse was brought for his escape. 2000 others lying all the day as dead departed in the night, Divers others plunged into the river Eske, and couered themselues vnder roots & branches of trees, many so streined themselves in their race that they fell downe breathlesse and dead, whereby they seemed in running from their deaths to runne vnto it.

The English discerned in their retreat that the execution had beene too cruell, and farre exceeding the bounds of ordinary hostility, which happely was a cause in the secret iudgment of God, that they had no better fruit of their victory. The dead bodies lay all the way scattered so thicke as a man may see sheepe grazing in a well stored pasture, most slaine in the head or necke for that the horsemen could not well touch lower with their swords, and scarce credible it is how soone they were stripped and laid naked vpon the ground. But then againe the eyes of all men were fastned vpon them with pittie and admiration, to behold so many naked bodies, as for talnesse of stature, whitnesse of skinne, largenesse and due proportion of limbes, could hardly be equalled in any one country. The ground where their severall battailons first brake, lay strewed with pikes so thicke as a floore is vsually strewed with rushes, whereby the places could hardly be passed ouer either by horse or by foot: the riuer Eske ran red with blood, so as they who perished therein might almost bee said to bee drowned in their fellowes blood.

On the other side when they came to the place where the English men at Armes had beene defeated, many of their horses were found grievously gashed or goared to death. The English who there perished were so deeply wounded, especially on the head that not one could be discerned by his face. Braue Edward Shellie, who was the first man that charged, was knowne only by his beard, Little Preston for that both his hands were cut off being known to haue worne bracelets of gold about his wrists, others were brought to knowledge by some such particular marks. Hereby appeareth (as I said before) what blessing is growne to both nations by their late happy union when before they were like two rude encountring Rammes, whereof he that escapes best is sure of a blowe.

Divers of the Nobilitie of Scotland were here slaine, and many Gentlemen both of worth and noble birth, of the inferior sort about 10000, & as some say 14000 lost their liues. Of the English were slaine 51 horsemen & one footman, but a farre greater number hurt. The Scottish prisoners accounted by the Marshals booke, were about 1500. The chiefe whereof were the Earle of Huntley, the Lords Yester Hoblie, and Hamilton, the M^r of Sampoole, and the L. of Wimmes. A Herault was also taken but discharged forthwith. The execution was much maintained by the Scots owne swords, scattered in every place. For no sooner had an English horseman brake his sword, but forthwith he might take vp another. Insomuch that many of them brake three or foure before their returne. So apparant is the hand of God against violation of faith, that it is often chastised by the meanes appointed to defend it.

Of all other the English men were least favourable to the Priests and Monkes, by the Scots called Kirkmen, who had beene equally troublesome in peace and vnprofitable in warre. To whom many as well English as Scots imputed the calamity of that day. these made a band of 3 or 4000, as it was said, but they were not altogether so many, howbeit many Bishops and Abbots were amongst them, from these divers Scots feared more harme by victory, then they found found among their enimies by their ouerthrow. After the field a banner was found of white sarcenet, whereon a woman was painted, her haire about her shoulders kneeling before a crucifix, on her right hand a church, and along the banner in faire letters written Afflicta ecclesia ne obliviscaris. This was supposed to haue beene the Kirkemens banner. But could this crucifix haue spoken, as one is said to haue spoken to S^t Francis and another to S^t Thomas, it might happely haue told them, that neither religious persons are fit men for armes, nor armes fit meanes either to establish or advance Religion.

I must not forget the fidelity of a Scottish souldier towards the Earle of Huntly. He finding the Earle assaulted by the English, and without his helmet, tooke of his owne headpeece and put it on the Earles head. The Earle was therewith taken prisoner but the souldier for want thereof was presently stroke downe. This Earle was of great courage & for this cause much loued of his souldiers, to whom he was no lesse louing againe. This he manifested by his great care for such Scottish prisoners as were either wounded or poore, providing at his proper charge, cure for the one and releife for the other. This Earle being asked whilst he was prisoner, how he stood affected to the marriage, answered that he was well affected to fauour the marriage but he nothing liked that kinde of wooing.

Certaine of those who escaped by flight excused their dishonor, not without a sharpe iest against some of their leaders, affirming that as they had followed them into the field, so it was good reason they should follow them out. Those bitter iests the more truth they carry, the more biting memory they leaue behinde.

The day of this fight being the 10th of September seemeth to be a most disastrous day to the Scotts, not only in regard of this ouerthrow, but for that vpon the same day 34 yeares before they were in like sort defeated by the English at Flodden field. The victory raised exceeding ioy among the English partly because it came so cheape, & partly by reason of the great danger and greater terror that had bin cast vpon them by reason of the repulse and disarray of their men at Armes.

Now as scildome one accident either prosperous or aduerse, cometh vnaccompanied with the like, so this calamity hapned not to the Scots alone. For whilst the English army had thus drawne both the preparations and intentions of the Scots wholly vpon them. The Lord Wharton and the Earle of Lennox entered Scotland on the west marches with 5000 men, and hauing marched two miles they wonne the church of Anan, a strong place and alwaies much annoying the English, there they tooke 62 prisoners, fired most part of the spoyle, and ouerthrew the fort with powder, passing 16 miles further they tooke the castle of Milke, which they fortified strongly and planted a garrison therein, and after much spoile and wast of the country returned safely into England.

These successes did strike such a terror into many of the Scots that the Earle Bothwell and diuerse cheife gentlemen of Tinedale and Meers supposing to finde more easy conditions by yeelding then by struiuing, submitted themselues to the King of England, and were receiued by the Lord Generall into protection. But it is most certaine that the English made not their best improuements of these fortunate euent, and that especially by two miserable errors, cunstation in prosecuting, and haste in departure. But doubtlesse the vnion of these two realmes was a worke most proper to Gods omnipotent arme, which afterwards effected the same, as by milder meanes, so in a more durable manner then they could haue bin vnited by Armes. This high appointment of God we must reuerence and admire, but not omit to obserue the errors committed.

First therefore after the retreat, the English lodged the same night in the place where the battaile had bin fought. Where and in the villages not farre distant they sojourned five daies, without doing any thing, in the meane time the English searched the riuers and hauens whether the Scottish ships were retyred, in such sort as they left few ships of war vnspoiled or vntaken, the army also gathered the spoile of the field, whereof 30000 iacks and swords, & 30 peices of great artillery were shipped for England.

The English hauing thus long breathed and thereby giuen breathing to their enemies fired Lieth tooke S^t Colmes, Broughticragge, Rokesborough, Humes castle, Aymouth, Fial castle, Dunglasse, Kilnecombe, and diuers other small pieces, whereof parte they ruined, parte they enlarged and fortified and furnished them with able souldiers, accustomed with often and prosperous successe. Herewith as if they had beene weary of their faire fortunes, they suddainly brake off the enterprise and returned another way into England, hauing staid not aboue 25 daies in Scotland, and lost vnder 60 men. The pretence of their departure was worse then the departure it selfe, namely for that the yeare and their prouisions were far spent, and the country afforded little forrage. Assuredly as nature taketh least care for those things which she formeth in hast, so violent and storm-like fortunes how terrible so ener, are seldome durable.

Now the Lord Gouvernor of Scotland being of great courage and sober iudgement, as a man might well read in his face, as he had amply performed his duty both before the battaile and in the field, so especially after the fight he declared himselfe to be of a stout and vnbroken spirir. For first he assembled the disperfed forces of the Scottish army, albeit not in sufficient manner to giue a fresh battaile, by reason that much of their armor was lost, yet able to keepe the English from ranging at large. Then hee presented the English with diuers offers of treaty touching matters in difference, vntill the country was discharged of them, lastly knowing right well that counsels are commonly censured by euent, and that in matters of armes, albeit the praise of prosperous successe is shared amongst many, yet the blame of misadventures is charged vpon one. And fearing hereby mutinies amongst his owne people, and contempt of others, hauing first assured the young Queene in place of good defence, he assembled the Scottish nobility and vsed words to this effect.

I assure my selfe that many of you my Lords and more of the vulger are much displeased with me for that I haue aduised this warre whereof so sad euents haue followed, for this cause I haue assembled you together to reduce you to a better opinion, or to blame you deeply, either if you remaine offended, or if you cast downe your courage throw feare, the betrayer of all succors which reason can afforde, for tell me if you are discontented with me for aduising this warre, doe you not condemne your selues for following the aduice? It is certaine that at the first you were all of my opinion, and that I did nothing without your approuement. If now vpon one misadventure you change your iudgements, and charge the fault only vpon me, you doe me wrong and discover your owne weaknesse, in being vnable to endure those things which you knew were casuall, and which you were resolu'd to endure. But I make no doubt but the same reasons which induced you to entertaine this warre, will induce you also to prosecute the same, howsoeuer sodaine and v unexpected euents dismay your iudgments, for the present.

Touching my selfe I was alwaies of opinion, and shall neuer change, that it is better the kingdome should be in good estate, with particular losse to many of the people, then that all the people should be well and the state of the kingdome altogether lost or dishonourably impaired, euen as it is better that a ship should be preserued with some discommodity to the sailers, then that the sailers being in health the ship should perish, or as it is lesse dangerous when diuerse parts of a tower are decayed and the foundation firme, then when the foundation is ruinous, albeit the parts remaine entire. For the common estate is but weakened by calamities of particular persons, but the ruine of the state innolueth all in a generall destruction. And therefore they are to be blamed alike, both who more and who decline warre upon particular respects, the com-either honour or necessity must bee the true measure of both.

But the cause of this warre is no other then that wee will not incontinently submit our selues to doe what our neighbours require. That is because at the first word wee are not forward to thrust our necks under the girdles of our enemies, yea our old enemies, yea our only enemies of any accompt for many years, who in their gluttonous hope haue deuoured our kingdome, who by the bloody execution of their late victories haue shewen what curtesie wee may expect at their hands. In doing whereof wee shall abandon our ancient and approved friends, who as they neuer failed vs in our extremities, so are they now prepared with large aides to relieue vs, who will not feare or pause at the least, before he leap upon this sodaine changer, who will forsake long tryed friends to rely upon those, who alwaies haue beene ready by Armes to infest vs. Not at all times upon desire either of reuenge or spoile, but to bring vs under their ambitious dominion, which of vs had not rather dye, this day then see our enemies in our strongest castles and yokes of garrisons cast upon our necks? Who will not pre-ferre a death for libertie before a life without it?

Their promises are faire and large indeed I must say but of what assurance? What assurance can we haue but that when we haue listned them into the chaire of state, wee shall not be compelled to be their footemen? If our prince were a man and should marry an inheretrix of England, wee should happily haue no cause to feare, but that he would maintaine the liberty of his native country, but being a woman and desired in marriage of a King of England, under whose power and custody she must abide, how shall we be able against his minde either to benefit or preserue vs, verily as men hate those that affect that honour by ambition which pertaineth not to them, so are they much more odious who either through negligence or through feare will betray the glory and liberty which they haue.

Now my Lordes if any surmise either that this warre will be long, or that we shall haue the worst in the end, his error is great, for removing whereof, I must tell you, that which many of you seeme either little to remember or neuer to haue knowne; doe you suppose the state of this realme, (of the valour whereof the enemy hath often found wofull prooffe) to be now so feeble that it cannot beare off a greater blow then this? It hath often done it and is able of it selfe to doe it againe, if our endeavours be answerable to our meanes, Our Ancestors haue sustained many greater dangers, and yet retaining their libertie haue left both it and their honour entire to vs, what are wee of lesse heart then they? For of lesse ability we are not, shall we shew our selues unworthy of our succession from them? Assuredly it is more shame for a man to loose that which he holdeth, then to faile in getting that which he never had.

But suppose our forces to be neuer driven then they are our ancient allies the French are vpon the seas and neere approaching for our reliefe, also our friends in Italie and other partes haue sent vs money to supply our wants, wherfore Lords it is meete that we resume our ancient courage, and addresse our selues for new preparation not only vpon those hopes both from our selues and our friends, but in contempt of our enemies. For often it hapneth that a prosperity v unexpected maketh men carelesse and remisse if they be not very wise, whereas they who haue receined that wound become more vigilant & collected, especially when they see not only the common honour and liberty but their particular both seignories and safeties to be at the stake.

And albeit the enemy hath done that which it was to be belieued they would endeavour to doe, in case we would not yeeld vnto them, yet as those things must be endured vpon necessity, which happen by the hand of God. So those which come from enemies must be borne by vertue. And since it is a custome of our country so to doe, sith our people are famous for being nothing abashed at crosse events, take wee heed this vertue faile not in vs. If it doth? If we shew our selues heart-

lesse and faint, wee shall utterly overthrow not only the glory but the memory, both of our ancestors and of our state.

As for those who haue yeelded to our enimies let vs esteeme them as fugitiues and traitors, who endeavour to cast themselves and their country into subiection but let vs stand assured, that they who least shrink at the stormes of fortune, whether in publique or private affaires are alwaies most vertuous and victorious in the end.

On the other side K:Edward added to his glory, curtesie & liberality; shewing himselfe most gracions in countenance to all, & giuing rewards sutable to every mans performance or place. The L: Protector he rewarded with lands of the yeerely value of 500^l, and certaine it is that these first fortunes raised vnto him a great respect both in other countries and among his owne people, and the rather because he was discerned to be much searching both into the Counsailes and after the events of all his affaires, and likewise into the condition and state both of his owne strength and of the countries neere vnto him.

But these prosperous proceedings were not only hindred, in their fairest course, but altogether stayd, and in some measure turned backe by reason of the vnadvised forwardnesse of diuers chiefe counsailors, in making both sodaine and unseasonable alterations in matters of state, whose greedy desires of hauing their wills in all they liked, bred both trouble to the realme and to themselves danger, for great & sodaine changes are never without danger, vnles the Prince be both well settled in government and able to beare out his actions by power, but whilest K. Edward was both vnripe in yeers and new in government to attempt a change both sodaine and great, could not be accompanied with many mischiefs. The great matters wherein alteration was wrought were especially two, religion and enclosures.

Now for that Religion is of so high and noble a nature, of so absolute necessity in a common wealth; that it is esteemed the foundation of Lawes, and the common bond of humane society, no sodeyne alteration can almost be made therein, but many will be induced thereby to attempt some alteration in rule, whence (saith Dio) conspiracies & seditions are often occasioned. For Religion being seated in the high throne of conscience is a most powerfull ruler of the soule and farre preferred before estimation of life, or any other worldly respect, for this advanceth man to the highest happinesse, It leadeth him to his last end, all other things are but instruments, this is the hand, all other things are but accessories this is the principall. And therefore as all men are naturally moved by religion, so when they are violently thrust forward by those who (as Liuie speaketh) make it their purpose to possesse soules by superstition, then doe they breake all bands of reason and of rule, no perswasion of the one, no command of the other can then restrain them. Multitudo vbi religione capta est melius vatibus quam ducibus suis parat. Curt. lib. 4^o.

I will not deny but that some change in religion is often expedient and sometimes necessary because more in that then in any other thing, it is hard to containe men from running in to one of these extreames either of vaine superstition or of carelesse contempt, but this must be done with a lost and tender hand, & as Cicero speaketh, vt quum minimo sonitu orbis in republica convertatur. Some respect should also haue beene given to those greene times, to the monstrous multitude muffled with 2 great plagues & corruptions of indgement, custome and ignorance, whereto may be added grieve at their owne wants, and envy at the prosperity of others, especially for that many bold spirits were busied, not only to incense but to lead them into much variety of mischief. And if it be said that K. Henry the 8th had quietly passed the like change before, I answere the example was not then to be followed, the kings were not equall either in spirit or in power. Euen as it is in the fable that albeit an Eagle did beare away a lamb in her talents with full flight, yet a raven endeavouring to doe the like was held entangled and fettered in the fleece.

Touching enclosures, I am not ignorant what a profitable purchase purchase is made thereby, not only to particular persons, but generally to the whole Commonwealth, in case it bee without depopulation, because a companie of lands inclosed, are thereby improved in worth 2 or 3^d parts at the least, hereby two great commodities ensue, riches and multitude of people, because the more riches are raised out of lands, the more people are thereby maintained. This doth plainly appeare by two shires almost, equall both in greatnesse and in goodnesse of soyle. Northampton much champion, and Somerset altogether enclosed, for if estimation may be made by musters, and by subsidies, tenths and fifteens enclosure hath made the one county more then double to exceed the other both in people and in wealth.

Notwithstanding the Lord Protector gaping after the fruitlesse breath of the multitude, & more desirous to please the most then the best causing a proclamation to be set forth against enclosures, commanding that they who had inclosed any lands accustomed to lie open should upon a certaine paine before a day assigned lay them open againe. This Proclamation whilst fewe were forward to obey gave occasion to the mutinous multitude instable in indgement and intempestuous when they are stirred all carried with a headlong rashnesse, and one following another as wiser then himselfe immoderately both in desire & hope to be easily drawn by others who had deeper reaches then themselves to matters which at the first they least intended.

And againe soone after the beginning of the young kings raigne, certaine iniunctions were set forth for remouing images out of Churches which had bene highly, not onely esteemed but honoured before, and for abolishing or altering some other ancient observations in the Church. Hereupon commissioners were dispatched into all parts of the realme to see those iniunctions to be executed, with these diuers preachers were sent furnished with instructions to perswade the people from praying to Saints as for the dead, for adoring Images, from use of beades, ashes and processions, from masse, dirge, praying praying in unknown languages, & from some other like things whereunto long custome had wrought a religious observation and for defect of preachers, homilies were appointed to be publicly read in Churches, ayming to the very same end.

Some other offering to maintaine these ceremonies were either punished or forced to recant, Edmund Bonner Bishop of London was committed prisoner to the Fleet, for refusing to receiue these iniunctions. Stephan Gardiner was likewise committed first to the Fleet, afterwards to the Tower, for that he had openly preached that it were well these changes in religion should be stayed, untill the King were of yeares to governe by himselfe. This the people apprehending worse then it was either spoken or meant, a question began to bee raised among them, whether during the Kings minoritie such alterations might lawfully be made or no, for the like causes Tonstall BP of Duresme, and Heath BP of Rochester, were in like committed to prison, all these being then and still continuing famous for learning and iudgement were dispossessed of their Bishoppricks, but no man was touched in life.

Hereupon a Parliament was held in the first yeare of the King: and by prorogation in the second, wherein diverse Colleges, Channeries, free Chappells, Fraternities, Guildes, &c. with all their lands and goods were put into the actual possession of the King: part of the goods and lands being sold at a low value, enriched many, and enobled some, and thereby made them firme in maintaining the charge, also that no man should speake against receauing the Eucharist under both kinds, which had beene restrained in times before, and that Bishops should be placed by collation of the King under his Letters Patents, without any precedent election or confirmation ensuing, and that all processes ecclesiastical should be made in the Kings name, as in writs at the common Law, and that all persons exercising Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction should haue the Kings armes in their seales of office, and further the Statute of the 6 Articles, and other statutes concerning punishment of Lollards were repealed, and so was another statute restraining the

the use of Scriptures in the English tongue, and the Kings supremacy over the Church of England was confirmed. Herewith a booke was set forth for publike prayers by proclamation, and for administration of the Sacraments; & other rights and offices of the Church, and diuerse punishments were appointed by proclamation, either for not using the formes prescribed in that booke, or for depraving any thing therein contained.

I forbear to rehearse other acts of this Parliament, albeit a noble writer in our time esteemes it to be a mayme in historie that the acts of Parliament should not bee recited, which I conceiue so farre to bee true as they occasion tumults or division, or some remarkable alteration in state, otherwise as I finde them not regarded by most imitable writers, so I account the relation of them both fruitlesse & improper for a true caryed history.

Now in this meane time the commissioners before mentioned were earnest in executing their authority. And either pulled downe or defaced all images in Churches, and that in such vnseasonable & vnseasoned fashon as if it had beene done in hostility against them, hereat many did expresse a sense of distast, some for religious respects, others in regard of the excellent artifice of some of their pieces, affirming that albeit religious reverence might happily haue beene either taken away or moderated, yet the civill regard which all men doe not only afford but affect, in maintaining the memory of those whom they honour or love, might be endured without offence.

Certainly albeit the religion of the Romans endured 170 yeeres according to a law of Numa Pompilius without any images, albeit the Persians had neither images nor temples nor altars, being of opinion that God could bee represented by no device that he had no temple but the world, no Altar but the heart of man, albeit Eusebius writeth that the people of Asia called Seres by expresse law forbad adoration of images, albeit that images were forbidden of Ly- curgius as drawing men from the true worship of that which cannot be seene. Albeit the ancient Germans & from the Brittaines, and the Gauls had neither Images nor Temples, albeit the Iewes, and in imitation of them, the Saracens and Turkes abhorre nothing more then Images, either in their temples, or in their houses, because the lawe of God forbiddeth not onely to adore but to make any image. Albeit the Christians continued along time without Images in their Churches, yet were they never entertained into any religion, but presently they tooke deepe root in the hearts and consciences of the common people. When Leo Isauricus surnamed Iconomadius assembled a counsell at Constantinople, wherein it was decreed that Images should be cast out of Churches and burnt, the West part of his Empire did therevpon first rebell, & afterwards revolt.

And yet while these proceedings were but in the bud, affaires of state without the Realme were maintained in good condition of honour, but seemed rather to stand at a stay, then either to advance or decline. In Scotland the warres were maintained by the L. Gray of Wilton, Lieutenant of the North, with variable success, he fortified Haddington, fired Dawkeith, and wonne the Castle where foureteene Scots were slaine, and 300 taken prisoners, hee spoiled much of the country about Edenburgh, Lowthum, and Meers, fired Muscleborough, and fortified Lowder, & tooke Tester, at the yeelding whereof he granted life to all except to one who had vsed vild speeches against K. Edward. Those speeches were commonly cast vpon one Newton but he charged them vpon one Hamilton, Herevpon Hamilton challenged Newton to the combate, which hee did readily accept and the L. Gray consented to the triall, to this purpose Lists were erected in the market place at Haddington whereinto at the time appointed, both the combatants entered, apparelled only in their doublets and hoses, and weaponed with sword, buckler, and dagger. At the first encounter encounter Hamilton draue Newton almost to the end of the lists, which if he had fully done he had thereby remained victorious, but Newton on the suddaine gaue him such a gash on the legge that therewith he fell to the ground, & Newton forthwith dispatched him with his dagger, certaine gentlemen then present offered to haue fought with Newton vpon the same point, but this was adiudged to be against the lawes of combate, wherefore Newton was not only acquitted but rewarded with a chaine of gold, & with the gowne which the Lord Gray did then weare, howbeit many were perswaded that he was faulty and happily neither of them was free, but he enioyed neither his escape nor his honor long, for soone after he was hewen in pieces by Hamiltons friends.

On the other side the Scots became before Broughtcragge with 8000 men and 8 pieces of Artillerie, but it was for that time well defended by the English who by often sallies enforced their enemies with losse of their Artillerie to abandon the attempt, after this diuers other enterprises were made vpon that fort; at the last it was taken where the Scots slue all except Sir Iohn Latterel the captaine who was taken prisoner.

And now Henry the 2^d of France having newly succeeded Francis the first, who dyed the last of March 1547. sent Monsieur Dasse his Licutenant into Scotland with an armie of about 10000 French & Almaines who ioining with the Scots besieged Haddington and that with so good earnest, as sixe pieces of artillerie discharged 240. shot in one day and in another 200 within 60 paces of the wall, they lodged so neere within the very ditches that the English slue diuers of them with plummets of lead tyed to a trunchion or staffe by a cord, the place was but weake and the brackes faire but the defendants by resolution supplied all the defects, making diuers sallies with such liuely spirit that the Assaylants were thereby discouraged from making assault. The English from Barwicke with about 1500 horse did often relieue the defendants by breaking through the the middest of their enemies, but at the last they were so strongly both encountred and enloased betweene the French Almanes and Scots, & that Sir Thomas Palmer the chiefe leader and about 400 were taken prisoners and diuers slaine. Herevpon the Earle of Shrewsbury was sent with an army of about 15000 men whereof 3000 were Almanes, but vpon notice of his approach the French raised the field, retyred so farre as Muscleborough & there encamped, attributing much honour to the English for their valour in regard of the small strength of the place which they defended, when the Earle had victualled & reinforced the towne, he marched forth towards the enemies and encamped neere vnto them, and first a few of the English horse aproched neere the army of the French, who sent forth some troopes of their horse to encounter them, but the English retyred vntill they had drawn the French into an ambush laid for the purpose and then charging together they had them cheap, amongst which two captaines of account were taken prisoners. The next day the Earle presented his army in plaine field before the enemies campe cloased in three bodies and ranged ready to abide battaile. The French had newly received supply of 14 or 15000 Scots but yet remained within their strength holding it no wisdom to venter on men resolute to fight, who being forthwith to depart the realme and could neither longe endanger nor indamage them much. So the Earle after that he had remained about an hower and perceiuing that the French intended not to forsake their strength, returned vnto his campe and afterwarde to England, destroying Donbarr and some other which stood neere his passage, the Army being dissolud, and the Scots thought secure, the Lord Gray with his horsemen entred Scotland did great wast in Tunedale and Liddesdale for the space of 20 miles, and returned with out encounter, Also a navy was apoynted to coast along with the army before mentioned mentioned, This fleet coming to Brent Island fired 4 ships then attempting vpon S. Minces were repulſed by the Lord Dun, and ſo without either glory or gaine returned into Englande.

Not long after the departure of the English army M^r Daſſie with his French and Almaines attempted ſodenly to ſurpriſe Haddington, the enterpriſe was gouerned in ſo ſecret manner that the French had ſlaine the English eſcoute and entred the baſe court and aproached the maine gates before any alarme was taken, but then the Towneſmen came forth many in their ſhirts, who with the helpe of the watch ſuſtained the aſſault, vntill the Souldiers in better apointment came to their aide. Theſe iſſued into the baſe court, through a pryue poſterne, and ſharply viſited the Aſſailants with Halbeards and ſwordes. Here the fight grew hot, the darkenes and danger terrifying ſome and animating others. Blowes flew at all adventures, woundes and deathes given and taken vnexpected, many ſcarce knowing their enimies from their friends: But ſhame wrought ſuch life and courage in the English, as very few of the enimies who entered the court eſcaped alieue, leauing their fellowes bleeding in their deadly woundes, yet M^r Daſſie not diſcouraged herewith gaue 3 liuely aſſaults more that morning, but was repelled with ſo great loſſe, that 16 Carts and Waggones were charged with carrying away their dead and dying bodies, beſides 300 left in the baſe court.

After diuers like adventures the English perceiving that the towne could not bee kept without danger, nor loſt without diſhonour, The Earle of Rutland was ſent with 3000 Almaines and as many borderers to demolish the towne and to bring the artillerie a way to Barwicke. The Earle not only accompliſhed his Charge but made wide waſt in his paſſage by ruine and ſpoyle. Herewith the caſtle of Hame was ſodenly ſurpriſed by the Scots and all the English therein either taken or ſlaine. This was effected by meanes of certaine Scots who vsed to bring viutuals to the English and were reputed their assured frindes, these both obieruing the weakenes of the place and orders of the garrison, discovered them to their fellowes and gaue entertainment for the surprise Gineing also warning to others never to trust either the curtseys or services of those whom they haue provoked to be their enemies.

About these times St Edward Bellingham Lo: Deputie of Ireland first with great diligence and care, then credite and reputation especially gained by that service, tooke Ocanor and Omor and reduced the other seditious Lords to good subiection Ocanor and; Omor guided by overlate counsaile of necessity left their Lordships and had a yeerely pension of 100^l assigned to either of them.

And now the French supposing that by reason partly of suspence of hostility betweene England and France, and partly of the English affaires in other places, matters with them would be neglected, determined to attempt a suddaine surprise of the fortresse of Bullingberge, to this end 7000 men were appointed vnder the conduct of Mr Chastilion furnished with ladders and other preparations for the surprise. They marched secretly in the dead time of the night, and when they approached within a quarter of a league. On Carter who had beene discharged of his pay by the English for takeing a French woman to wife, and then serued vnder the French ranne privily before, and gaue the Alarme to those in the Forte. The English drewe him vp, the walles betweene two pikes and vnderstanding the danger addressed the selues to their defence by reason wherof the French at their approach had so warme a welcome, every of the English contending that his valour might be noted for some helpe in the fight, that at their departure they laded 15 wagons with their dead. Carter himselfe adventured brauely in places of greatest danger, and receiued two great hurts in his body, St Nicholas Arnault the captaine was likewise hurte with a pike in the face, diuers others were wounded & about 25 slaine The assault continued with great obstinacy from midnight vntill somewhat after the breake of day.

Shortly after 300 English on foote and 25 horsemen were appointed to goe to a wood, about 2 leagues from Bullingberge, hauing carriages with them, for bringing certaine timber for mounting great Artillery, and some other vses when they approached neerer the edge of the woode, about 500 French horsemen issued forth and gaue three sharpe charges vpon them, the English empaled themselves with their pikes, and therewith bare off their enemies, and being lined with shot (the cruell plague of horsemen) the French were in such sort galled with arrowes that many were wounded M^r Cauret and diuers others slaine, 70 great horses lay dead in the field and one Cornet was taken. The English fearing greater forces began to retire, and therewith appeared about 2000 French and Almaines on foote. But the English maintained an orderly retreat, vntill they came within fauour of the shot of Bullingberge and then the enemy adventured no further, & in this manner the old wounds of warre began freshly to open & bleede betweene England and France.

But in this meane time such tempests of sedition tumbled in England more by default of governors then the peoples impatience to liue in subiection, that not only the honour but the safetie of the state was thereby endangered. For as the commissioners before mentioned passed to diuers places for establishing of their new iniunctions, many vsauory scornes were cast vpon the, & the further they went from London as the people were more vnciuill so did they more rise into insolencie & contempt. At the last as one M^r Body a commissioner was pulling downe images in Cornwall, he was sodainely stabbed into the body by a Priest with a knife.

Herevpon the people more regarding commotioners then commissioners, flocked together in diuerse parts of the shire as clouds cluster against a storme, and albeit iustice was afterwards done vpon the offenders, the Principall being hanged and quartered in Smithfield, and diuers of his chiefe complices executed in diuers parts of the Realme, albeit so ample a pardon was proclaimed for all others within that shire touching any action or speech tending to treason, yet could not the boldnesse be beaten down either with that severity or with this lenity be abated. For the mischief forthwith spread into Wiltshire and Somersetshire, where the people supposing that a common wealth could not stand without Commons, beat downe enclosures, laid parkes and fields champaine. But Sr William Herbert afterwarde Earle of Pembroke with a well armed & ordered company set sharpely vpon them, and oppressing some of the forwardest of them by death, suppressed all the residue by feare. But their duty depending vpon feare the one was of no greater continuance then the other.

The like motions followed in Sussex, Hampshire, Kent, Glostershire, Warwickshire, Essex, Hartfordshire, Leicestershire, Worcestershire and Rutlandshire. But being neither in numbers nor in courage great, partly by authority of Gentlemen, and partly by entreaty and advice of honest persons they were reduced to some good appeasement, as with people more guided by rage then by right, yet not altogether mad, it was not vneasy. But herein happily some error was committed, that being only brought to a countenance of quiet, regard was not had to distinguish the rebellion fully. For soone after they brake forth more dangerously then before for no part could content them who aimed at all. After this the people in Oxfordshire, Devonshire, Northfolke and Yorkshire fell into the same madness, incensed by such who being in themselves base and degenerate, and dangerous to the state had no hope but in troublesome times. To Oxfordshire the Lord Gray of Wilton was sent with 1500 horse and foote, to who the gentlemen of the country resorted, drawing many followers followers with them, the very name of the Lord Gray being knowne to be a man of great valour and fortune, so terrified the seditious, that vpon the very report of his approach, more then halfe fell away and dispersed of the residue, who being either more desperate or more sortish did abide in the field, many were presently slaine, many taken, and forthwith executed. To Devonshire was sent John Lord Russell, Lord of the priny seale, whose forces being indeed, or being by him distrusted to be inferior to the importance of the service, he sate downe at Honington, whilest the seditious did almost what they would, vpon this heaviness of the kings forces going forward interpreted to be feare and want of mettle, divers either of the most audacious or such as pouerty or feare of punishment might easily plunge into any mischiefe, resorted to the seditious daily from Cornwall and other parts, as bad humors gather to a bile, or as divers kennels flow to one sinke, so in short time their numbers encreased to 10000 tall & able bodies. They were chiefly guided by Humphery Arundell a man well esteemed for military seruices. About 6 others of inferior note were hold actors with him. Many priests vnworthy to be named were also impetuous and importunate incensors of the rage, men of some academickall learning in discourse, but their mindes not seasoned with any vertuous or religious thoughts.

Assuredly the vulgar multitude is not vnjustly termed a beast, with many heads not guided, I will not say with any proportion but portion of reason; violence and obstinacy like two vntamed horses, draw their desire in a blinde-folde Carriere. They intend most foolishly what they never put in action, and often act most madly what they never intended, all that they know to doe, is that they know not what to doe, all that they meane to determine proues a determination and meaning to doe nothing. They attribute more to others iudgement then to their own, esteeming bold obstinacy for bravest courage and impudent prating for soundest wisdom, and now being assembled into one company rather without a Lord then at liberty, to accomplish their misery they fall to division of all calamities the worst, and so broken in their desires that many could not learne either wherefore they came, or what they would haue done. Some were commonwealth mutiners, and some did mutiny for religion. They who were for the common wealth could agree vpon no certaine thing, but it was certaine they could agree vpon nothing, some would haue no iustices, some no gentlemen, some no laiers nor ordinary courts of iustice, and aboue all enclosures must downe, but whether all or which or how to be employed none could tell, every man regarding what he followed but not what might follow thereof. All would haue the state transformed, but Whether reformed or deformed they neither cared nor knew. They concurred only in confused clamors, every man thinking it no lesse reasonable that his opinion should be heard, then that his body should be adventured.

The religious mutiners were not altogether so various in their voices, as hauing some few spirits among them by whom they were both stirred & guided, these in the name of the people hammered vp the Articles following, & sent them to the King, vpon granting of which they professed that both their bodies & their goods should be absolutely at the kings devotion.

- 1 That curats should administer baptisme at all times of necessity as well on weekedaies as on holidays.
- 2 That their children might be confirmed by the Bishop whensoever they should within the dioces resort vnto him.
- 3 Forasmuch as they believed that after the words of consecration noe substance of bread remaining but the reall body and blood of Christ, that the masse should be celebrated without any man communicating with the priest, for that many put noe difference betweene the Lords body and other meat, some saying that it is bread before and after, some saying that

that it is profitable to none except he receiues it.

4 That they might haue reseruatiō of the Lords body in their Churches.

5 That they might haue holy bread and holy water in remembrance of Christs precious body and blood.

6 That Gods service might be said or sang with an audible voice in the Quire and not forth like a Christmas play.

7 That Priests line chaste (as St Paul did) without marriage, who said to all honest Priests, be yee followers of me.

8 That the 6 Articles set forth by K. Henry the 8th, be so vsed as they were in his time, at least untill the K. should accomplish his full age.

Now albeit the King knewe right well that no reasons would serue for deniall, and that the yeelding to them in any thing would profit him nothing, but rather make them rise to more insolent demands, yet hee returned an answer in writing and therewith his generall pardon, in case they would desist and open their eyes to discerne how their vncircumspect simplicitie had beene abused especially in matters of religion, for that as some vertues resemble some vices so neere, as the one is often taken for the other, so religion and superstition doe so neerely resemble, that it was easie for men to disguise the one vnder the maske of the other. First therefore hee reproveth them fairely for their disorderly assemblies, against the peaceable people of the Realme and against the honour of his estate, fearing much that by reason of their disobedience, his lenitie should appeare to be lesse then he would haue it, also for that they vsed his name in all their writings, not only without his authoritie but even against himselfe, abusing thereby the weaknesse of many, and drawing them into societie of their euill. Then he pitied their ignorance and the errors thence arising, whereby they were allured to new hopes by some, who could not thriue so well by their honest endeavours, as by rapine and spoile, who stopped all course of law and discourse of reason to open the full flood-gate of their vnmeasurable madnesse, who to overthrowe the state pretend libertie, but if they should ouerthrowe it all libertie were lost.

For saith he who hath borne you in hand that children even in case of necessitie cannot be baptised but vpon holidiaies, whereas there is no day nor houre wherein the Minister is not only pennitted but commanded to baptise. By like abuse you are perswaded that many hold that the blessed Sacrament of Christs body doth nothing differ from common bread, whereas Lawes, Statutes, Proclamations, common practise agree, that common bread is only to sustaine the body but this blessed bread is food for the soule. Touching confirmation, doth any beleue that a child baptised is damned vnlesse it be confirmed? If it be baptised and also confirmed, is it srued only by confirmation, and not by baptisme? Or is it the more saued by confirmation? children are confirmed at the age of discretion to teach them what they receaued in their infancie, they are taught by confirmation to continue in that whereto they were baptised, oh how much doe they need who will never bee content? What may satisfie those who haue no limits to their desires.

As for the order of service and vse thereof in the English tongue, which you esteeme new it is no other then the old, that same words in English which were in Latine, except a few things omitted so fond, that it had bin a shame to haue heard them in English, and how can any reasonable man be offended to vnderstand what God by his word speaketh vnto them, what they by their prayers speake vnto God; If the service were good in latine, it remaines so in English, for nothing is altered but to make you vnderstand what is said, In like sort the masse with great iudgment and care was reduced to the same manner as Christ left it, as the Apostles vsed it, as the ancient Fathers receaued, practised and left it.

But you would in sober earnest haue the six Articles againe reuiued, Doe you vnderstand what you would haue, or are you masters of your owne iudgment. If you vnderstand them and yet desire them, it is not long since they were enacted, and haue since drawne much blood from the subiects, as would you haue bloody lawes againe in life, or would they any long time be endured? Vpon pittie they were taken away, vpon ignorance they are againe demanded, Verily that in the Gospell may truly bee said of you, yee aske yee knowe not what, for you neither know what good you shall haue by receiuing them, nor what euill you haue lost by their abolishing, our intention is to haue our lawes written with milke, but you would haue them written with blood. They were established by law and so obserued, although with much expence of blood, they are abolished by law with sparing of blood, and that also must be obserued, for vnlesse lawes be duly obserued, neither the authority of the Prince, nor safetie of the people can be preserved.

And whereas you would haue them remaine in force vntill our full age, if you had knowne what you speake, you never would haue giuen breath to such an vnseasoned thought, for what is our authoritie the lesse for our age, or shall we be more King hereafter then now? or are you lesse subiects now then in future times you shall be? Verily as a naturall man we haue now youth, and by Gods sufferance expect age; but as a King we haue no difference in yeares, we are rightfull king by Gods ordinance, and by descent from our roiall ancestors, and not by any set number of yeares, and much it is to bee feared, that they who moued you to require this suspence of time, would absolutely denie our royall power, if they durst so plainly expresse themselves.

The seditious as men alwaies dangerous, when they haue once broken awe, interpreted this or any other milde dealing to proceed from some faining or fainting disposition either doubting or daring most when they are most fairely entreated, and the more to enslave the popular rage, fresh rumors were devised and divulged, that the people should be constrained to pay a ratable tax for their sheep and other cattle, and an excise for every thing which they should eat or drinke, by which and other like reports the simple were blinded, the malicious edged, all hardened from applying to any peaceable perswasion.

And now vnable to support themselves either with their own estate or by waite of villages, they aspired to the spoile and subiection of citties, and first they came to Exeter and demanded entrance, but the citizens as they were both ciuill and rich, so were they better advised, and therefore closed their gates, and refused to haue any entercourse with the seditious, but either by common obedience, or else by hostility and armes; the popular fury being thus stopped, swelled the more. Wherevpon they resolved to apply their endeauiours for taking the citty, and either by destroying it to increase terror, or else by sparing it to winne an opinion of moderation, they had no great artillery to open a breach, and yet without reason they gaue an assault, and vsed diuers meanes to mount the walls, but the more madnesse they shewed in their attempt, with the greater losse they were driuen backe, then they fired the gates at two severall times, but the citizens at both times by casting in wood maintained the fire, vntill they had cast vp a halfe moone within, vpon which when the seditious attempted to enter they were slaine from the corners like dogges. After this they mined the walls, laid the powder and rammed the mouth, but the citizens made a counter mine, whereinto they powred such plentie of water, that the wet powder could not be fired.

In the meane time the L. Priuy Seale lay at Hunnington expecting more strength, and knowing right well that as the multitude are slow to danger, so are they most desperate when they are stirred, but whilst he expected more companie, many of those he had slipped away from him. Herevpon he resolved for retaining the rest to entertaine some present sent enterprife, and first he assailed by a by way to enter and relieue the citty, but the seditious for prevention hereof had filled all the trees betweene S. Mary Outry and Exeter, & laid them crosse the waie in such sort as they impeached his passage, herevpon firing such places as hee thought might serue either for vse or ease to the seditious, he determined to returne to Hunnington. But the seditious forelaid a bridge, over which hee should passe, called Fennington bridge, and in a great faire meddow behinde the bridge placed a great number vnder banners displaid. The Lord priuy seale had but a small company in regard of the seditious. Yet with good order and courage hee attempted the bridge but could not force it, at the last finding the riuer to be fordeable at the foot of the bridge, he there set ouer his horse, wherevpon the guardes appointed to defend the bridge forooke their charge, and retired to their strength in the meddow. Then the kings forces charged liuely vpon them, and they againe as stoutly receiued the charge, but being an vntrained multitude without either souldier or guide, they were soone broken and put to flight, yet they valued themselues and tumultuously charged vpon the kings forces, but were presently rowted and cast out of the field, the chase was not far pursued for feare of fresh succours from before the citty. Notwithstanding the seditious lost 600 of their men, and the Lord Priuy seale returned without losse to Hunnington.

At this time the seditious liued by rapine and ruine of all the cuntry, omitting nothing of that which savages enraged in the height of their vnruely behaviour doe commit, but the Cittizens driven to great distresse for want of victuales, bread they made of courtest branne moulded in cloathes, for that otherwise it would not cleaue together. Their finest flesh was of their owne horses, especially for 12 daies they endured most extreame famine. During this time they were much encouraged by an aged cittizen, who brought forth all his provisions and said, that as hee did communicate vnto them his store, so would he participate of their wants. And that for his part he would feed on the one arme and fight with the other before he would consent to put the citie into the seditious hands. Herewith the Lord priuy Seale for want of power to performe any services, was about to rise and returne to London. But in good time the Lord Gray came to him with supply of forces most Almane horsemen, and with him came Spinola with his band of Italians consisting of 300 shot, purposed for Scotland, also 200 men were sent vnto him from Reading, so being in all not much a boue 1000 strong, he made head against the seditious. So departing from Honington he came to a little village fro whence lay 2 waies towards Exeter, both which were blocked vp with 2 bulwarkes of earth, made by the seditious, hither they had driuen 2000 men from before Exeter whom they divided into 4 companies. In either of the Bulwarkes they lodged one, at the bridge neere the backe of one of the fortes a third company was placed, the 4th was laid in ambush behinde a hedge on the high way, at the backe of the other fortresse, the Arriere of the kings forces led by capitaine Wauers set vpon one of the fortes, the vaward and battaile vpon the other, Spinola with his shot did beare vpon those within, who offered to appeare vpon the walls. At length Capitaine Wauers wonn the fort which he assailed, and draue the defendands to the bridge where one of their companies made stand, Herewith the other two companies did forthwith resort vnto them, one from the second fort, the other from the Ambush. These casting a strong guard vpon the bridge, marshalled the residue vpon a plaine ground behinde the bridge. The Kings forces coming forward draue the guard from the bridge, and making profit of the fresh terror set vpon those who were vpon the plaine. The kings footmen were firmly ranked, the troopes of horse in good array, whereas the seditious had neither weapons, order nor counsaile, but being in all things vnprovided were slaine like like beasts. They tooke their flight towards S^t Mary cliffe but the souldiers vpon disclaime of their vnworthy actions filled themselves with revenge and blood, and slue of them about 900 not sparing one.

This sad blow abated much the courage and hope of the seditious, and yet the next day about 2000 of the n affronted the Kings forces at the entrance of a high way, whom when they found both ready and resolute to fight, they desired enterparlance, and in the meane time began to fortify. But vnderstanding that their intention was vnderstood more like slaues then souldiers they furiously ran away. The same night the seditious before Exeter raised theirseige, and therewith discharged the citty from many miseries and dispaire. The King afterwards enlarged the constant obedience of the citty with enlargement both of liberties and of reuenues, hee gaue vnto the n the mannor of Euand for a perpetuall remembrance both of their loialty and of his loue.

Now the seditious driven almost to a dead dispaire and supported only by the vehemency of desire, brought forth their forces to Clifton heath, to whom many of the most vile vulgars resorted hourelly, which much enlarged their numbers but nothing their strength, but what measure haue men in the encrease of madnes, if they keepe not themselves from falling into it, they brought with them a crucifix vpon a carte couered with a canopie, and beset with crosses, tapers, banners, holy bread and holy water as a representation of those things for which they fought. The Lord Gray encouraged his men to set sharply vpon the vague villaines good neither to liue peaceably nor to fight, and to win at once both quiet to the Realme and to themselves glory, so he brought the Kings forces vpon them rather as to a carnage then to a fight, insomuch as without any great either losse or danger to themselves, the greatest part of the seditious were slaine, diuers also were taken, of whom the common sort were forthwith executed by martiall triall law, the chiefeſt leaders were ſent to receiue iuſtice at London, Some eſcaped and ſailed to Bridgewater, who taking dangers to be the only remedy againſt dangers, endeavoured to ſet vp the ſedition againe, but they were ſpeedily reſſeſſed, and thereby the ſedition ſuppreſſed wholly.

The ſedition thus broken and beaten downe Sir Anthony Kingſton provoſt marshall of the kings army was deemed by many not only cruell but vncivill, and inhumane in his executions. One Boyer maior of Bodmin in Cornwall was obſerved to haue bene among the ſeditious, but by absolute enforcement as many others were. The Martiall wrote to him a letter that he would dine at his houſe vpon a day which he appointed, the maior ſeemed glad, and made for him the beſt proviſion that he could, vpon the day he came and a large company with him, and was receiued with many ceremonies of entertainment. A little before dinner he tooke the maior aſide and whiſpered him in the eare, that execution muſt that day be done in the towne, and therefore required him that a paire of gallowes ſhould be framed and erected againſt the time that dinner ſhould end; the maior was diligent to accompliſh his demand, and no ſooner was dinner ended, but he demanded of the Maior whether the worke were finiſhed, the Maior answered that all was ready, I pray you ſaid the provoſt bring me to the place, and therewith he tooke him friendly by the hand, here beholding the gallowes he asked the Maior whether he thought them to be ſtrong enough, yes ſaid the Maior doubtleſſe they are, well then ſaid the provoſt get you vp ſpeedily for they are prepared for you, I hope answered the Maior you meane not as you ſpeake, in faith ſaid the provoſt there is no remedy, for you haue bene a buſie rebell, and ſo without reſpite or defence hee ſtrangled to death.

Neere the ſaid place dwelled a Miller who had bene a buſy actor in that rebellion, and fearing the approach of the the provost martiall, told a sturdy tall fellow his servant that he had occasion to goe from home, and therefore gave directions that if any one should enquire after the mill, he should not speake of him but affirme that himselfe was the mill, and that so he had bin for three yeares before, So the provost came and called for the mill, his servant came forth and said he was the man. The provost demanded how long he had kept the mill, these three years answered the servant, then the provost commanded his men to lay hold on him, and to hang him on the neereſt tree, then the fellow cried out that he was not the mill but the millers man, nay S^r answered the provost I will take thee at thy word, and if thou beest the miller thou art a busy knave, if thou beest not, thou art a false lying knave, whatſoever thou art thou shalt be hanged, when others also told him that the fellow was but the millers man, and what then said he? could he ever have done his master a better service then to hang for him, and so without more to doe he was dispatched. Assuredly this might have passed for a tollerable jest if it had not beene in a case of life.

Divers others were executed by martiall law, & a great part of the country was abandoned to the spoile of the souldiers, who not troubling themselves to discern betweene a subject and a rebell, whilst their liberty lasted made indifferently profit of both.

The seditious in Northfolke were somewhat dangerous, both because their strength was greater, as also because the city of Norwich was a friend vnto them, or at least wished them no great harme, and being faithfull to neither side, was alwaies ready to entertaine the stronger, their first attempt was made at Attleborough where they threw downe the fences of one Greene of Wilbie, who was supposed to have enclosed a parte of Attleborough common adjoining to the common pasture of Harsham. Afterward they assembled at a play accustomed yeerely to be kept at Wimondham, and from thence went to Morley a mile mile distant, and there cast downe the ditches of one Hubbarde, next by incitement of John Flowerdew of Nethefet, a gentleman of good estate, but neuer expressing desire of quiet, they did the like to certaine enclosures of Robert Ket a tanner in Wimondham, and receiued of him 38^l 4^d for their labour, this Ket who hath made his obscure beginning well knowne by his mischievous attempts to require Flowerdew carried them to Nethefet, where they cast down all the enclosed pasture of Flowerdew, and not staying there he led them indifferently to diuers other places, laying all enclosures where hee came rather wast then open.

And the rather to traine them to his allure, he told them both often and with vehement voice, how they were ouer topped and trodden downe by gentlemen, and other their good masters, and put out of possibility ever to recover foote, how whilest rivers of riches ran into their landlords coffers, they were pared to the quicke, and fed vpon pease and oats like beasts, how being fleeced by these for privat benefit, they were stayed by publique burthens of state, wherein whilest the richer sort favoured themselves, they were gnawen to the very bones, how the more to terrify and torture them to their mindes, and winde their necks more surely vnder their arme, their tyrannous masters did often implead arrest, cast them into prison, and thereby consume them to worse then nothing, how they did palliat these pillaries with the faire pretence of authority and of law, fine workemen I warrant you, who can so closely carry their dealings, that then men only discouer them, how harmelesse counsailes were fit for tame fooles, but for them who had already stirred there was no hope but in adventuring boldly.

The likenes of affection and the masking of vices vnder pleasant tearmes, procured not only assent, but applause to all that he said, and so by often and earnest repeating of these and the like speeches, and by bearing a confident countenance in all his actions, the vulgar tooke him to be both valiant and wise, and a fit man to be their commander, being glad they had found any captaine to follow.

Their numbers encreased daily, and therewith their boldnesse and power to doe harme, they were largely supplied at the first both with victuals and armes, albeit not with open consent of the places adioining, yet with much private goodwill, for many did not only secretly favour but openly approue their designs. Generally every good man was much grieued, many vpon some dislikes before reioiced in their greater harmes, and not regarding in what liberty they stood, were ready to runne into any bondage, The Sheriffe of Northfolke resorted vnto them, and made proclamation in the Kings name, that forthwith they should peaceably depart, and had he not beene ready & his horse swift to depart in time, hee should hardly haue departed from them aliuie.

After this they drew towards Norwich and seated themselves at Monshold neere Mount Surrey and vpon S. Leonhards which hangeth ouer Norwich, another company seated at Rising neere Lynne, but they were dislodged by the gentlemen of the countrey, and forced to draw to their fellowes at Monsholde. Here the maine body encamped and sent diuers light companies forth to terrifie and roue. To this place many resorted out of Suffolke, and from all places of Norfolke, many for want, but most vpon a turbulent minde, and in all places thereabout beacons were fired, and bells rung, as a roaring furtherance to his vproare, so as in short time the multitude encreased to 16000, and yet rather to be esteemed a number then an army.

Their actions were couered and disguised with mantles very vsuall in time of disorder of religio & iustice, for they had one Coniers for their chaplaine, a man brought vp in idle and dead studies, who both morning and evening read solemne prayers, many sermons they also had either by entreatie or enforcement. But D^r Parker afterwards Arch- bishop of Canterbury in his sermon before them touched them for their liuing so neere, that they went neere to touch him for his life, as for Iustice they had a bench vnder a tree where Kes vsually sate, and with him two of euery hundred whence their companies had beene raised, here complaints were exhibited and examined aswell against those of their owne company, who receiued iudgement for their offences as against any gentleman or other in the country, by commandment from hence many were very violently pulled from their houses, of who so ne were enforced to follow them, others were cast into prison, & happily fettered with irons, and not a few rudely and dangerously entreated, from hence also warrants were sent forth in the kings name, whereby ordinance, powder and thos were commanded out of ships and any other furniture of warre out of houses where it could be found. This tree was ever since termed the oake of reformation.

And now the seditious being advanced vnto the height both of their power and of their pride, presented certaine complaints to the King, and desired that a herald or some other messenger of credite may be sent vnto them to receiue articles of all those matters wherewith they concerned themselves to be grieued. The King tooke it for a great indignity that base traitors & theeues should offer to capitulate with him as enimies law: fully holding the field, and yet knowing right well, that as good counsailes gather strength by time, so vpon a little respite euill advices either vanish or grow weaker to winne some advantage of time, returned an answer. That seeing he was ready alwaies to receiue and relieue the quiet complaints of any of his subjects, he marvailed much either vpon what opinion of necessity in themselves or of iniustice in him, they should first put themselves into armes, as a partie against him, and then present him with their bold petitions, especially at such a time when hauing fully reformed many other matters, he had lately set forth a proclamation against excessiue prices of victualls, and had also appointed commissioners with ample authority for diuers other things, whereof many doubtlesse had beene by that time redressed, had not these disorders giuen impediment to his designs, generally when they might well discern both his care and endeavours to set all matters in a right frame of reformation, as might best stand both with his honour and their sureties, and with iustice and providence towards all. Touching their particular complaint for reducing lands & farmes to their ancient rents although it could not be done by his ordinary power without a parliament, yet he would so farre extend his authority roiall and absolute as to giue charge to his commissioners to trauaile with all persons within their countyes, to reduce lands to their former rents whereat they were farmed 40 yeares before, and that rents should be paid at Michelmas then next ensuing according to that rate, & that such as would not presently yeeld to his commissioners for that redresse, should at the parliament which he would forthwith summon be overruled.

Concerning their complaint for price of wolles hee would forthwith giue order that his commissioners should cause clothiers take wolles paying only two partes of the price, wherat they were commonly sold the yeare next before, and for the other third part, the owner and the buyer should stand to such order as the parliament should appoint. At which time also he would giue order that landed men to a certaine proportion should be neither clothiers nor farmers, and farther that one man should not vse diuers occupations, nor haue plurality of benefices, nor of farmes & generally that he would the giue order for all the residue of their requests, in such sort as they should haue good cause not only to remaine quiet, but to pray for him, and to aduenture their liues in his service.

This parliament he promised should beginne in the beginning of October then next ensuing, against which time they should appoint 4 or 6 of their countrey, to present bills of their desires, and in the meane season apply themselves to their harvest and other peaceable businesse at home, and not to driue him to necessity (whereof he would be sorry) by sharper meanes to maintaine both his owne dignity and the common quiet.

These letters carrying the Kings name in the front, and the protectors with the kings signature at the foote, were sent by a heralde to Mansholde, a place guarded with great, but confused and disordered strength of the seditious, herewith also the King sent his generall pardon, in case they would quietly desist and dissolue. But the seditious were so farre from accepting these of any other offers of accord that herevpon they discharged the first shot against the citty, and because their Artillery being planted on a hill could little or nothing endamage the walls, they removed their batterie to a lower ground, but because their citty was weake, and the cittizens but weakely disposed against them, with no danger and little travaile they made themselves masters thereof. Here they imprisoned the Ma-ior and many other of the chiefe cittizens, and ordered all things at their pleasure, but maintained the chiefe seat at Mansholde, where it was before. The Maior of Norwich and some other gentlemen of credite they constrained to be present at all their counsells, with intention to countenance their actions with some authority, but in no sort to be guided by them, All this time the Kings forces advanced but slowly, being imploied in appeasing the like disorders more neere the heart of the kingdome. So that it is most certaine, that had these seditious beene so mischievously bent as in number they were great, they might haue proued more dangerous then they were, but they aimed not at ambtrious ends, their rude earthly spirits were neuer seasoned with any manly adventurous thought, and therefore they were content with a licentious & idle life, wherein they might fill their bellies by spoile rather then by labour, to this side their companies ranged in all parts thereabouts thereabouts, and tooke away for their vse much household-stuffe and goods, but especially they brought to their stations many droues of cattle, for besides deere out of parkes, besides beecues, besides fowles of all kinds within a few daies were brought out of the country 2000 muttens, such numbers of sheepe were daily brought in, that a fat weather was sold for 4^d. This was interpreted for a present plentie but it made such scarcitie afterwards, as could not in many yeares be repaired, Sr Edmond Knevet Knight with such company as he could assemble, charged vpon one of their watches by night, but he was so farre inferior vnto them, that it was esteemed a great fortune that he departed from them with his life.

But soone after the Lord William Parre Marquis of Northampton was sent against them with 1500 horsemen, and a small band of Italians vnder a Captaine named Malatesta, he was accompanied with the Lord Sheffield, the L. Wentworth with diuers knights and gentlemen of principall estimation, when he approached within a mile of the citty, the magistrates and chiefe cittizens vpon summons, resorted to his standard, yeelded vnto him the citty sword, and professed their owne loialty, and excused others of inferior force, who neither by ignorance fauoured the seditious, or through feare durst not declare against them; with these the Lord Marquis entred the citty at Saint Stephens gate, the citty sword being borne before him, and thereby caused the chiefe cittizens to assemble in the market place, both to giue aduice and to take direction how the citty might best be defended.

In the meane time the strangers who came with him whether by appointment or by adventure, issued forth of the citty, to view both the numbers and orders of the seditious. They againe first put forth their Archers, then their horsemen, lastly a company ran furiously forth without either direction of others or iudgement in themselves, intending to haue enclosed the Italians, but here might haue beene a great difference betweene men practised to fight, and men accustomed only to spoile. For the Italians in so well advised order receiued the seditious coming rashly vpon them without either feare or skill, that diuers of the tumultuous numbers were slaine, at the last the Italians perceiuing themselves almost inuironed, cast themselves into a ring and retired backe into the citty. But they left one gentleman of their company behinde, who being overthrowne from his horse fell into the hands of the seditious, who like sauages spoiled him of his armour and of his appaell, and hanged him ouer the walls of Mount Surrey.

This caused the seditious to remaine the first part of the night within their station, which by reason of the nastines of the beastly multitude, might more fitly be termed a kennell then a campe. Within the citty diligent watch was kept, which was often visited and relieued. The souldiers remained in their armor all night, and kept so great a fire in the marker place that all parts of the citty were lighted therewith. The seditious about midnight began to shoote off their great artillerie very liuely and thicke, hereupon the Lord Marquis directed part of his forces to rampart the gates and ruinous places of the walls, which the seditious espying, with a hideous roaring and rage they powdered themselves vpon the citty, some endeavoured to fire the gates, some to mount ouer the walls, and some to passe the riuier, the fight continued three houres, and it is almost incredible with what rude rage the seditious maintained their assault, some being almost disable to hold vp their weapons would striue what they could to strike their enemies, others being thrust through the body with a speare, would runne themselves further to reach those who gaue them that deadly wound, at the last their obstinacy was overcome, and they returned to their cabbines with losse of 300 of their company.

The residue of the night which was not much, the souldiers

diers within the citty applied in refreshing themselves, but the next morning the seditious both with greater strength and better order entered the citty by the hospitall and began a most desperate surpris, the forces of the Marques albeit inferior in numbers, yet by reason of the freshness of the place might haue beene sufficient, if they had charged in order, and together, but being scattered in the streets, they were not able to make resistance, herewith they were much endammaged by the cittizens from their houses, so as 100 of them perished, many were hurt, and the residue driven to forsake the citty, the Lord Shiffields horse fell with him into a ditch, whereby hee fell into the power of the seditious, and as he pulled off his helmet to shew them who he was, a butcher slew him with the stroak of a club. Divers gentlemē to the number of 30 were taken and committed to streight prison, where they were vexed alike with scarcity and scome. The seditious lost a bout seauen schoore of their company, and yet much fleshed with this successe, they spoiled many parts of the citty, and fired the houses of those whom they esteemed not to bee their friends, but the rage of the fire was at first hindred and then appeased by fall of a suddaine shower of raine, wherevpon many presaged that the flames of this sedition should neither spread farre nor long endure. The report of this repulse flying to London, the most made of that which was true, and many falsities added thereto. The Earle of Warwiske was sent with such forces both English and strangers, wherewith hee had appointed for service in Scotland. when he came to Cambridge the Lord Marquis resorted vnto him, and also the Lord Willoughby, Powes and Bray, his two sonnes Ambrose and Robert and many knights and gentlemen of name, with these hee marched somewhat leasurely because the importance of the danger might make the service the more esteemed, At length hee presented his forces consisting of 6000 foote and 1500 horse before the citty vpon the plaine, and forthwith sent to summon the seditious and to offer pardon if it would be accepted, But neither summons nor pardon was any thing regarded. Inſomuch as when the Kings pardon was offered by a herault, a lewd boy turned towards him his naked britch, and vsed words ſutable to that geſture, one ſtanding by and moued with this barbarous behauiour diſcharged a harquebur vpon the boy, and ſtroke him with the ſhot a little aboute the reines. Hereat thoſe ſeditious that ſeemed moderate before became deſperate, and thoſe who were deſperate ſeemed ſtarke mad, whence ſuch tumults, ſuch conſuſed hollowings and howlings enſued, that the heralde was glad to withdraw himſelfe.

Then the Earle planted his cannon againſt S^t. Stephens gate, and ſet pioners to worke againſt the brazen gate. The cannon againſt S. Stephens gate executed ſo well, that in ſhort time the Portcullis and gate were broken, and entry opened into the city. Others entered at the brazen gate but in that entrance ſome were ſlaine. Alſo the Maiores deputy opened Weſtwicke gate where the Earle himſelfe entred without reſiſtance and poſſeſſed himſelfe of the market place, at theſe entrances 130 of the ſeditious were ſlaine 60 were taken and forthwith executed by martiall law. As the Earles carriages were brought into the citty neither garded nor regarded as they ſhould, diuers of them were ſurpriſed by the ſeditious and driuen to Monſholde. At this bootie they were more ioyfull then griued at the loſſe, either of the citty or of their companions, eſpecially for that they were ſupplied thereby with good ſtore of powder and ſhot, wherein their want did moſt conſiſt.

The Earle being in poſſeſſion of the citty rampared all the gates except thoſe who opened towards Monſholde, wherein he planted good artillerie. But the ſeditious the more terrible by reaſon of their more deſperate fury fell vpon thoſe gates albeit without order, yet with ſuch rude and careleſſe courage and cries, that they beat backe the guardes, ſlew the principall gunners, carried away their artillery, tillerie and therewith certaine carts laden with munition, here were boies obserued to be so desperately resolved as to pull arrowes out of their owne flesh, and deliuer them to be shot againe by the archers on their side, herevpon the Earle was enforced to blocke vp those gates as hee had done the rest, but the citty was so weake that it could hardly be defended.

For the seditious being now furnished with artillerie powder and shot battered Bishopsgate, and cast downe a great part of the walls vpon that side of the citty. They afterwards passed the riuer likewise and assailed the Earles men vpon advantage in the streets, of whom many they slew, & fired diuers places prostrating two parishes almost entirely, so they did mischief they little cared what they did or to what end, and in such sort the danger encreased that many perswaded the Earle to submit courage to rage, and for a time to abandon the citty. But he not easily vincible in spirit, and well assured that hauing stopped all passages for reliefe, shortnesse of provision would in very short time draw the obstinacy of the seditious to shorter limits, drew his sword and caused others to doe the like, & (according to a souldiery custome in cases of extremity by enterchange of a kisse by every of them vpon the swords of others, sealed a resolution to maintaine the place.

Assuredly as it is advantageable to a physition to be called to the cure of a declining disease, so it is for a commander to suppress a sedition which hath passed the height, for in both alike the noxious humor doth first weaken and afterwards waist and weare to nothing, and besides it is scarce possible that a rude and ruinous multitude should continue long together, if any preuention be applied, but they will fall into irreparable wants, and so it hapned to these seditious, who after three daies, finding their provision to faile, fired their cabbines built of timber and couered with bushes, and with a broken noise betweene certaine questions and doubtfull answeres dislodged from their hill, and entrenched them at the foote thereof in a valley called Duffendale where they invited the Earle to a present encounter, and as there hath seldo ne hapned any sedition within this realme, but the chiefe actors therein haue beene abused with some prophecies of doubtfull construction, so the seditious were moued to remoue to this place vpon a prophecy much credited among them, that they should fill it with slaughtered bodies, but whether of their enimies or of their owne it was left vncertaine, the words of the prophecy were these.

The country Knuffes Hob, Dicke and Hick, with clubbes and clouted shaunc:

Shall fill up Duffendale, with slaughtered bodies soone.

The Earle being newly supplied with 1400 horse was glad that the seditious had forsaked their hill, for that his horsemen in whom consisted his greatest strength, could there performe but little service, so the next morning he sent forth all his horsemen of whom 1000 were Almaines, as accustomed so aduentrous in armes, his foote hee retained within the towne. The seditious ranged themselues for the fight, placing all the gentlemen whom they had taken in front every two couple together to make them sure from starting away. The Earle before he would charge sent to them an offer of a generall pardon, one or two of the principall exepected. But this more chafed the rage of those who were resolued either to liue or dye together & what cared they for pardon, who haue nothing but a vile and ser vile life to loose. For no more could be gotten from their estates, then from the shauing of an egge, wherefore in a proud scorne they answered this offer with a great shot, that stroke the kings standard bearer on the thigh, and his horse on the shoulder, Herevpon the Earle commanded his artillery to be applied, the Almaines also and captaine Drury with his troopes gaue a resolute charge, & yet with such discretion that most of the captiue gentlemen men who were placed in the front escaped without harme, these were so well seconded by the light horse, that in short time they brake the seditious, chased them aboute three miles, and filled themselves with blood vntill night, there dyed of them 2000 as K. Edward tooke the number, but our histories report more then 3500.

In the meane time they who guarded the artillerie and baggage, encoased themselves with carriage and a trench, and pitched stakes to beare of the approach of horses, determining to stand stilly vpon their defence. The Earle returning from the execution, did certifie them by message, that because the King his master was desirous to establish peace rather by benignity then by blood; hee did assure them their pardon if they would submit, otherwise they might expect nothing but death. Answer was made that they expected nothing but death, and that they respected nothing at all, but it was by the sword if they stood vpon defence, and by the halter if they should yeelde, wherefore they made choice to dye rather as souldiers then as dogges. The Earle sent againe to know if they would entertaine their pardon in case he should come in person and assure it, they answered, they did conceiue him to be so honourable, that from himselfe they would most thankfully embrace it. So hee roade and caused their pardon to be read to them, and engaged his honour that it should be performed. Then seeming to respect life more then any other thing, threw away their weapons and disloyalty together, and with voices so lowd as before they were, lewd wished all ioy and prosperity to the King.

The commander Ket hauing a good horse fled away with the first, and the next day was taken with his brother William in a barne, and brought with a guard of 20 horsemen to Norwich both of them hauing made good prooffe that they were no lesse peaceable to guide an army in war, then they were to governe themselves in peace. Nine of the principall were hanged vpon the tree of Reformation, of whom whom two were seducing prophets, a third was a most excellent cannonier, whose good skill euellie imploied did much endamage the forces of the King. Robert Ket and his brother were sent to London, and from thence returned to be executed in Northfolke. Robert Ket was hanged in chaines vpon Norwich castle, his brother William was in like sort executed vpon Wimondham steeple, but not without some murmuring. For that church dedicated to the seruice of God, and which is polluted by violent death, should be made a place of publike execution. The day of this defate of the seditious was a long time after yearly obserued for a festiuaill day by the inhabitants of Norwich, as well by cessation from labour, as by resorting to Church to giue publike thanks for their deliuerance,

About the same time another sedition was raised at Sc-mor in the Northriding of Torkeshire where of the chiefe mouers were William Ombler a gentleman, Thomas Dale a parish clarke, & Stenenson a post. They tooke encouragement from a darke and deceivable prophecy, a common law both of obedience and peace, which did foretell that the time should arrive when there should be no King when the nobility and gentry should be destroyed, when the Realme should be ruled by foure gouernors elected by the commons holding a parliament in commotion, which should beginne at the South and North seas of England, and that present they vnderstood to be the time, and that the rebellions in Devonshire Norfolke and Torkeshire should draw together to accomplish this prophecy. The pretences were to restore the church to her ancient Rights (for that was alwaies one note in their musique) to relieue the poore, to abate the rich, and generally to disburthen the Realme of all grieuances, a seemely taske for such vndertakers.

And now for execution hereof, first by firing of beacons and ringing of bells (as if the coast had beene assailed by enemies) they assembled about 3000 in armes, whom they drew drew to be appliable to their purpose. Then to beginne their great worke of reformation they slew one White a Gentleman, Saunge a Merchant and two others of meaner quality, and left their bodies naked vpon the wild neere Semor. After this they passed to the Eastriding in Yorkeeshire, their company daily increasing like a snowball in rowling, and many they tooke with them much against their mindes. But no sooner was the kings pardon presented, but most of them fell off and disperied, leauing Ombler and Dale almost alone. These as they were riding like mad men from towne to towne charging people in the Kings name to assemble at Hummanby were apprehended, and with foure others of the most tumultuous, soone after executed at Torke whose speedie punishment staid others who were thought to wauer betweene obedience and revolt.

Now the French king supposing to make his hand by these rude rauages in England brake of his treaty of peace proclaimed hostilitie & denounced the same by his Embassador to the King. Hereupon all French men in England not Denizens were taken prisoners, & all their goods seized for the Kinge. The French King vnderstanding that certaine English ships lay at Iersey set forth a fleet of gallies & ships intending to surprise them as they lay at Anchore. But the English being both vigilant & well appointed in such sort did entertaine them, that their ships departed terribly torn with losse of 1000 men at the least, The French King fearing least that the bad successe of this first enterprise, might both discourage his peope and bring diureputation to himselfe, forbad any report to be made not only of the euent, but of the iourney.

After this the French King leuied an army by lande wherewith marching towards Bulloine, he tooke Blackenesse and Newhaunen two fortes of the English neere vnto Bulloine. This he did effect chiefly by the treason of one Sturton a bastard sonne of Lord Sturtons, and by reuolt of diuers diuers Almaines, who serued in the garrisons, who being meere mercenarie did easily encline to the strongest.

From whence the French King marched towards Bullaine vpon whose approach St Nicholas Arnault capitaine of Bullingberge holding the place not of strength to be held withdrew all the ordinance & matters of worth into high Boullaine and with gunpowder blew vp the Forte. So the French King brought his armie before Boulline, but because the plague raged amongst his souldiers & the weather was vnseasonable by reason of much fall of raine, he departed from his army and left Chastilion gouernor in his steed.

Chastilion bent his siege against the Pierre, which was erected in Boulline haven and after batterie of 20000 shot or more the breach was thought reasonable and therevpon the assault was giuen. But the same was so well encountered by the valour of the defendants, helped with advantage of place, that the obstinacy of the assailants did nothing but increase their losse, so as the first fury being broken and spent, The French resolved to attempt the peice no more by assault, notwithstanding they continued the seige, presented diuers skermishes & false attempts, but they spent both their labour & shot without putting the defendants in any feare. Then they planted their artillery against the mouth of the haüen, to impeach supply of victuals to the towne. Yet the English victualers surceased not at the Kings adventure to bring all things necessary, vntill the end the souldiers of the towne set vpon the French suddenly by night, slue many of them and dismounted their pieces.

Then the French applied their batterie againe, wherein they sometimes spent 1500 shot in one day. But finding this to be a fruitlesse fury they afterwards vsed it more sparingly and rather vpon a shew of hostility then vpon any hope thereby to preuaile. In the meane season they charged a galley with grauel and stones, and prepared to sinke it in the midst of the haüen. But the English tooke the galley before it sunke and drew it to the shoare, and vsed the stones to reenforce the Pierre. After this they made faggots of light matter, mixed with pitch, tarre, tallow, rosin, powder, and wildfire, with intention to fire the ships in the haven, but that enterprise was defeated by the Bul-lenois, and their faggots taken from the French. During these enterfeits diuerse skirmishes passed betweene the English and the French about the frontires of Calles, which as they were but light, so most of them ended with disadvantage to the French.

And now if all these troubles had not beene sufficient to trauaile the realme of England, at once a great diuision fell among the nobility, so much the more dangerous, by how much the spirits were more actiue and high. And albeit the heat thereof was much appeased for a time by the great iudgement and moderation of the King, yet did it breake forth in the end to tragicall euent, not vpon particular persons only, but did much ouerflow and almost ouerwhelme the whole realme with disquiet, and hereof the most apparent originall was this.

The King had two vnckles brothers to Queene Iane his deceased mother, Edward D. of Somerset Lord Protector, & Thomas Lord Seymer Baron of Sudley, high Admirall of England, as the Duke was elder in yeares, so was hee more staied in behauiour. The Lord Sudley was fierce in courage, courtly in fashion, in personage stately, in voice magnificent, but somewhat empty of matter, both were so faithfully affected to the King that the one might well be termed his sword, the other his target. The Duke was greatest in fauour with the people, the Lord Sudley most respected by the nobility, both highly esteemed by the King, both fortunate alike in their advancements, both ruined alike by their owne vanity and folly, whilst these two brothers held in amity, they were like two armes, the one defending the other, and both of them the King, but many things did moue together to dissolue their loue and bring them them to ruine. First their contrary disposition, the one being tractable and milde, the other stiffe and impatient of a superior, whereby they liued but in cunning concord as brothers glued together but not vnited in graine, then much secret enuy was borne against them, for that their new lustre did dimine the light of men honoured with ancient nobility. Lastly they where openly minded, as hasty and soone moued, so vncircumspect and easy to be minded. By these the knot not only of loue but of nature between them was dissolued, so much the more pittie for that the first cause proceeded from the pride, the haughty hate, the vnquiet vanity of a mannish or rather of a diuelish woman.

For the Lord Sudley had taken to wife Katharine Parre Queene Dowager last wife to King Henry the 8th, A woman beautified with many excellent vertues, especially with humility the beauty of all other vertues. The Duke had taken to wife Anne Stanhope a woman for many imperfections intollerable, but for pride monstrous, she was exceeding both subtile and violent in accomplishing her ends, for which she spurned ouer all respects both of conscience and of shame. This woman did beare such invincible hate, first against the Q. Dowager for light causes and womans quarrells, especially for that she had precedency of place before her, being wife to the greatest Peere in the land, then to the Lord Sudley for her sake. That albeit the Q. Dowager dyed by childbirth, yet would not her malice either dye or decrease. But continually she rubbed into the Dukes dull capacity, that the Lord Sudley dissenting from him in opinion of religion, sought nothing more then to take away his life, as well in regard of the common cause of Religion, as thereby happely to attaine his place. Many other things she boldly faired being assured of easie beliefe in her heedlesse hearer, alwaies fearfull and suspitious (as of feeble spirit) but then more then euer by reason of some late opposition against him. Her perswasions she cunningly ly intermixed with teares, affirming that she would depart from him, as willing rather to heare both of his disgraces and dangers, then either to see the one or participate of the other.

The Duke embracing this womans counsaile (a womans counsaile indeede and nothing the better) yeelded himselfe both to aduise and deuise for destruction of his brother. The Earle of Warwicke had his finger in the businesse and drew others also to giue either furtherance or way to her violent desires. Being well content she should haue her minde, so as the Duke might thereby incurre infamy and hate. Herevpon the Lord Sudley was arrested and sent to the tower, and in very short time after condemned by act of parliament. And within few daies after his condemnation a warrant was sent vnder the hande of his brother the Duke, whereby his head was deliuered to the Axe. His owne fierce courage hastened his death, because equally ballanced betweene doubt and disdaine, he was desirous rather to dye at once, then to linger long vpon curtesie and in feare.

The accusations against him contained much friuolous matter, or terme them pittifull if you please. The act of parliament expresseth these causes of his attaindor. For attempting to get into his custody the person of the King, and gouernment of the realme. For making much prouision of moay and of victualls, for endeauiouring to marry the Lady Elizabeth the Kings sister, for persuadinge the King in his tender age to take vpo him the Rule & order of himselfe. The proofes might easily be made because he was neuer called to his answere. But aswell the protestations at the point of his death, as the open course & earriage of his life cleered him in opinion of many. So doubtfull are all weighty matters whilest some take all they heare for certaine, others making question of any truths, posterity enlarging both D^r Latymer pretending all the grauity and sincerity of a professed diuine, yet content to be seruiceable to great mens ends, declared in a sermon before the King that whilst the Lord Sudley was a prisoner in the Tower he wrote to the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth the Kings sisters, that they should reuenge his death, which indeed the Lady Mary afterwards more truly did by executing the Earle of Warwicke, then either shee was or at that time could in particular be required. Many other imputations he cast forth, besides most doubted many knowne to be vntrue, and so whereas Papinian a ciuill lawyer but a heathen chose rather to dye then to defend the murther which the Emperor Caracalla had done vpon his brother Geta, some theologians haue beene imployed to defile places erected only for religion and truth by defending oppressions and factions, detesting their professions, and the good artes which they had learned by publishing odious vntruths vpon report and credite of others.

O wiues! The most sweete poison, the most desired euill in the world. Certainly as it is true as Syracides saith, that
 Cap. 25. there is no malice to the malice of a woman, so no mischief wanteth where a malicious woman beareth sway, a woman was first giuen to man for a comforter but not for a counsailor, much lesse a controler and director, and therefore in the first sentence against man this cause is expressed because
 Gen. 3. 17. thou obeyest the voice of thy wife. And doubtlesse the projector by being thus ruled to the death of his brother seemed with his left hand to haue cut off his right. For here vpon many of the nobility cryed out vpon him that hee was a bloodsucker, a murtherer, a parricide, a villaine, and that it was not fit the King should be vnder the protection of such a rauens wolf. Soone after it was giuen forth and belieued by many that the King was dead, wherevpon he passed in great estate through the cittie of London to manifest that he was both aliue and in good health, whether this speech were spread either by aduenture or by arte, it is vncertaine, certain it is it did so. nothing shake the strength of the Kings affection towards the Protector.

Besides many well disposed mindes conceiued an hard opinion of him, for that a Church by Strand-bridge, and two Bishops houses, were pulled downe to make a seat for his new building, in digging the foundation whereof, the bones of many, who had beene there buried, were cast vp and carried into the fields, and because the stones of those houses and the Church did nothing suffice for his worke, the steeple and most part of the Church of S. Iohn of Ierusalem neere Smithfield, most beautifully erected and adorned not long before by Decray, Prior of that Church, was mined and ouerthrowne with powder, and the stones applied to this spacious building. And because the worke could not be therewith finished, the Cloister of Pauls on the North side of the Church, in a place called Pardone church-yard, and the dance of death, very curiously wrought about the Cloister, and a Chappell that stood in the midst of the Church-yard, also the Charnell house that stood vpon the South side of Pauls (now a Carpenters yard) with the Chappell, Tombes and Monuments therein were beaten downe, the bones of the dead carried into Finsbury fields, and the stones conuerted to his building. It is constantly affirmed that for the same purpose he intended to pull downe the Church of S. Margaret in Westminster, and that the standing thereof was preserued only by his fall: assuredly as these actions were in an high degree impious, so did they draw with them both open dislike from men, and much secret reuenge from God.

And now hath the Lord Protector played the first act of the tragedie of his life, namely his high and prosperous estate, he is now stepping into the second act, wherein he beginneth mainly to decline.

For the Earle of Warwick espying opportunity, shewing himselfe and knowing that in troublesome times the obedience of great persons is most easily shaken, drew about 18. of the Priuy Councel to knit with him against the Lord Protector. These hee did so winde vp to his purpose that they withdrew from the Court, fell to secret consultations, and walked in the Citie with many seruants weaponed and in new Liueries, the causes thereof many coniectured, but few knew. They were all desirous that the Protectors greatnesse should bee taken lower, but none conceiued that the Earles malice did extend vnto death. But the Lord Protector, as humble then as hee had beene haughtie before, sent Secretary Pecier to them in the Kings name, to vnderstand the causes of their assembly, and to declare vnto them that he would thanke them for hating him, in case they did it in loue to the King, intreating them for the Kings sake, if not for his safetie, yet for his quiet, that they would forbear open shew of hostility, and resort vnto him peaceably that they might commune together as friends. In the meane time he armed fūe hundred men, part of the Kings and part his owne, the Court gates were rampard, and people raised both by letters and proclamation to aid the King, and the more to increase the present terrour, hee remoued the King by might from Hampson Court to Windsor, with a company more resembling an armie than a traine.

On the other side, the Lords at London first taking possession of the Tower, sent for the *Maio*r and Aldermen of the Citie to the Earle of Warwicks lodging at Ely house in Holborne, here they presented themselves secretly armed, and the Lord Rich, then Lord Chancellor of England, a man of quicke and liuely deliuey of speech, in this manner spake vnto them.

I am not ignorant into what aduenture I now plunge my selfe in speaking against a man both high in honour and great in fauour, both with the King and many of the people. But my dutie preuailing against respect of danger, I will plainly declare the discontentments of the Lords of his Maiesties Council, haue already conceined against the actions past of the Lord Protector, as also their feares touching matters to en-

ensue, that with your aide they may in good time happily remedy the one and remove the other, assuring you all that as I will not utter any thing falsly, so will I forbear to tell many truths.

And first to touch upon his open ambition, with what good reason or purpose thinke wee did he being a man of many imperfections, as want of eloquence, personage, learning, or good wit aspire to the great offices of governing all affaires of state, fit for none but whom God hath favoured with fitting graces. And albeit these defects might have beene well supplied by sufficiency of others of the counsaile, yet was hee so peeuishly opiniative and proud, that he would neither aske nor heare the advice of any, but was absolutely ruled by the obstinate and imperious woman his wife, whose ambitious and mischieuous will so guided him in the most weighty affaires of the realme, that albeit he was counsailed by others what was best, yet would he doe quite contrary, least he should seeme to need their aduice. And yet this was not enough, as avarice and ambition haue neuer enough, but to adde dignity to authority, and to make sure that as no man should as in power so in title surmount him, he would be advanced to the Degree of Duke of Somersset, which hath alwaies beene a title for one of the kings sons inheritable to the crowne.

And albeit it may seeme a light matter to speake of bribery and extortion against him, yet his robberies and oppressions haue beene such, that no man would willingly haue adventured to commit them, unlesse he thought by reason so to assure himselfe as he could not be called to answer for them. For he hath laid his rauenous hands upon the Kings treasure and Jewels left by his Father, which were knowne to be of an inestimable value, that it might well be said even as he had giuen forth, that K. Henry died a very poore prince, and had beene utterly shamed in case he had liued one quarter of a yeare longer.

Then also what hauncke hath he made of the Kings lands and inheritance? What sales and exchanges upon pretence of necessity necessity? And yet what a high deale hath he transported to himselfe? Without regard of others who haue employed their trauailes & estates in seruice of the King & of his deceased Father? What artes hath he vsed to spend those & spare himself against the time of his mischievous purpose. How greedily, how insatiably hath he neuer ceased the whilest to rake & gleane mony together? What shamefull sale of offices & preferments hath he made, nothing regarding the worthinesse of the person, but the worth and weight of the gift. Betraying thereby the administration of the realme into the hands both of worthlesse and corrupt men. To speake nothing the whilest of his minte at Duresme place erected & used for his priuate profit. To speake nothing of the great Bontifale of colledges and chantries, to speake nothing of all his other particular pillages, all which were so farre from satisfying his bottomles desires that he proceeded to fleece the whole Commonwealsh, to cut and pare it to the very quicke.

For vnder colour of warre, which either his negligence drew on or his false practises procured, he lenied such a subsidie vpon the whole realme as neuer was asked a greater at once, which should not haue needed, albeit the warres had beene iust, in case he had not imberleed the Kings treasure as he did, for besides he extorted money by way of loane from all men who were supposed to haue it, and yet left the Kings souldiers and servants unpaid. But in all these pretended necessities, how profuse was he in his priuate expences? Carrying himselfe rather as fitting his owne greatnesse then the common good? How did he riot surfeit vpon vaine hopes, as if new supply for wast would neuer want? What treasures did he bury in his sumptuous buildings? And how foolish and fancifull were they? A fit man forsooth to gouerne a realme, who had so goodly gouernment in his owne estate. All these things as there are but few but know, some may be assured that hee neuer durst haue committed halfe of them with a minde to haue remained a subiect vnder the law, and to be answerable for his actions afterwards, but did manifestly intend to heape his mischiefs with so high a treason as he might climbe above his soveraigne and stand sure beyond reach of law.

And for inducement to this his traiterous designe he suborned his servants and certaine preachers to spread abroad the praises of his government, with as much abasing the noble King Henry as without impudence they could devise. Following therein the practises of K. Richard the tyrant, by depraving the Father to honour the sonne, to extinguish the love of the people to the young King, by remembring some imperfections of his Father; which example both traiterous and unnaturall who doubts but his heart was ready to follow, whose heart was ready to defame his father, and set nought by his mother (as it is well knowne) and to procure, yea labour the death of his brother, whom albeit the law and consent of many had condemned upon his owne speeches yet his earnest endeavor therein did well declare what thoughts can sinke in to his unnaturall breast, & what foule shifts he would haue made, rather the that his brother should haue escaped death, to that end that he might remoue at once both an impeachment to his poysonous purposes & a surety to the Kings life & estate. To this ende he also practised to dispatch such of the nobility as were like to oppose against his mischeimous drift, & in such sort either to encumber & weaken the rest, that they should be noe impediments to him. In the meane time he endeavored to winne the common people both by strayed curtesey & by loosenes of life, whereto he gaue not only licence, but encouragement and means.

And the better to advance his intents he deviseth to intangle the realme not only with outward warre that with rumor thereof his dangerous diuices might be obscured, but but with inward sedition by stirring and nourishing discontentments among the nobility gentry and commons of the realme. This he did under pretence of such matters as all men desired might be redressed more gladly then hee, but in a more quiet and settled time. But the time seemed most convenient for him when under the sweete pretence of release and libertie to the people might haue destroyed the Nobility and gentry, who are the defence and safety of the people, and so at pleasure haue reduced all under his tyrannous subiection.

Which how insupportable it would haue beene may well be coniectured by his actions already past, what pride and insolency of his men made up of naught? What instruments had he in euery shire to worke his purposes, to spread his rumors, to harken and to carry tales? And those what flatterers? What tyers? How greedily gaping for other mens linings? How vigilant to grope mens thoughts, and to picke out somewhat whereof they might complaine? and such vile vermine how deere were they to him? and namely Iohn Bonham his one hand in Wiltshire, Sir Gyles Partridge his other hand in Glocestershire, his customer in Wells, Piers country, his minister in Deuonshire, besides many his bad conditioned minions in courte, what monsters were they? How esteemed they his fauour aboue all mortall respects.

And further to accomplish his ambitious ends, he devised to make the French king his friend, by bewraying unto him the Kings fortresses beyond the seas, which the late noble K. Henry with great charge courage and glory, had brought under his power, which practise was so caryed, that no man but such as discerned nothing but did perceiue it. And that aswell by his often private conference with the French Embassadors and their secretaries, as by failing to furnish those pieces with necessarie supplies, as also by the speeches which himselfe and his servants cast abroad, that Bulloine and the fortresses about it were an vnprofitable burthen to the realme. But for the charge no man will conceiue that he wanted money to keepe them, who undertooke so great a charge as the conquest of Scotland, and wasted euery day a 100^l upon his phantasticall building.

Besides it hath beene often heard from his owne communication, how he intended to procure a resignation of the rights of the Kings Maiesties sisters, and others who are entitled to the possession of the Crowne, and to haue entailed the same upon upon his owne issue, which when he had effected, and having the Kings person in his power, the chaine of soueraignty could not long haue tied him selfe, he might haue atchieued all his ambitious intentions at will.

Wherefore surely he hath thus put on the person not only of a robber, and of a murderer, but of a traitor to the state, since we haue evidently discovered both his lofty and bloody minde. It behoueth you to ioyne in aide with the Lords of his Majesties privy counsaile, as in extinguishing a raging fire, as in repelling a cruell enimie, for assuredly wee must either weakly yeelde to his rule and commande, or else the ambitious author must be taken away.

In the afternoone of the same day the Lord Maior assembled a common counsaile in Guildhall, where two letters arriued almost in one instant, one from the King and the Lord Protector for 1000 men to be armed for defence of the Kings person, another from the Lords at London for 2000 men to aide them in defence of the Kings person, both parties pretending alike, but both intending nothing lesse. The Recorder whose voice accordeth commonly with the Lord Chancellor did so well set forth the complaints of the Lords against the Protector, that many were inclinable to fauour their side. But one named George Stadlowe somewhat better aduised stept vp and spake vnto them as followeth.

This businesse (right Honorable Lord Maior & the residue of this court) as it is a very high passage of state, so it is worthy of serious consideration, & that upon sodeine aduice nothing be done or determined them, least happely by being serviceable to the designs of other men whose purposes we know not, we cast our selues into the throat of danger which hitherto wee doe not see, two things I much feare in case wee afford present aide to the Lords, either of which should cast upon vs abridle rather for stopping a while, then for stepping or stirring too soone or too fast at their incitement. One is the certayne dangers of the city, the other the vncertaine adventure

First then if wee adioine to the Lords, whether they preuaile or not wee engulph our selues into assured danger, an example whereof I finde in Fabian whose report I entreat you all to obserue. In the time of King Henry the third, the Lords in a good cause for maintenance of diuers beneficiall lawes desired aide of the citty against the King. Ayde was granted and the quarrell brought to the arbitrement of the sword. In this battaile the King and his sonne were taken prisoners, & upon their enlargement free pardon was granted not only to the Lords but the cittizens of London which was afterwards confirmed both by oath and by act of Parliament. But what followed? Was the displeasure forgotten? Noe verily, nor euer forgotten during that Kings life, for afterwards the liberties of the Citty were taken away, strangers were appointed, governors, and the cittizens perpetually vexed, both in their persons and in their estates. So heavy and durable is the wrath of Kings. That Solomon saith: The indignation of the King is death. For it is naturall for princes to uphold their soveraignty, and to holde it in highest esteeme, in no case to endure their supream authority to be forceably either oppressed or dispressed by their subiects. Insomuch as they mortally hate such subiects as haue once attempted either to ouerrule them by power, or to cast any terror upon them. And howsoever they may be either constrained or content to beare saile for a time, yet are they so sure paymasters in the end, that few haue held out their lines, I will not say prosperously but safely, who haue offered enforcements against their King.

Now touching my feare for the commonwealth, I much suspect these considerations. I alwaies expect from them some lurking mischiefe, which the more cunningly it be kept in, the more dangerously it will breake forth. For albeit there be many hands in this action, yet one is the head who doubtless hath skille to play his owne game, and albeit the pretences giuen forth are alwaies faire, and for the publique good, yet are the secret intentions commonly ambitious, & only aime at private ends, yea many times the end is worse than the first intent. Because when a subject hath obtained the hand against his Prince, I will not say hee will be loth, but doubtlesse it is not safe for him to give over his advantage, wherefore I am of opinion, that for the present if wee will not be so uncourteous as to delay, and suspend our giving aid to the Lords for a time.

Vpon this aduice the Court resolved to arme an hundred horse-men and foure hundred foot for defence of the City. To the King they returned answer that they would be readie vpon any necessitie to apply all their forces either for his defence or for his honour. But they intreated him to be pleased to heare such complaints as were objected against the Lord Protector before he assembled forces in the field, which in those tempestuous times as it could not bee done without great danger, so without great cause it should not: To the Lords they answered, that they were readie to ioyne with them in any dutifull petition to the King, but to ioyne with them in armes, they could not vpon the sudden resolve.

The next day, the Lords at London dispatched a Letter to the Lords at Windsor, wherein they charged the Protector with many disorders both in his priuate actions, and in his manner of government, requiring that he would disperse the forces which he had raised, and withdraw himselfe from the King, and be content to be ordered by iustice and reason. That this done they would gladly commune with the rest of the Councell for the surety of the Kings person, and for ordering of his estate, otherwise they would make no other account of them than they might trust to finde cause, and would assuredly charge them according to their demerits.

The King all this time was so farre from gouerning his Lords, that he was scarce at his owne libertie, and considering that the late rebellions had but newly wearied themselves into quiet, and fearing new rages among the vnstable people daily threatned, and vpon such occasion not vnlike to take flame, conceiuing also that the confederacie treached no deeper, or that the onely remedie was to seeme so to conceiue, dissolued his companies except only his guard, but charged them vpon warning to bee readie, so it is most certaine that the troublesometimes were a great aduantage to the Lords. Had the people bene well settled in subiection, or the Protector a man of spirit enough, they had bene in danger to haue bene vndone, but the Protector, in stead of vling his authoritie, sent Secretarie Peter (who vnder pretence of grauitie, couered much vntruistinesse of heart) to the Lords at London, with some secret instructions sent especially to perswade them, that for a publike benefit, alleither priuate guards or vinkindnesse might be laid aside. But neither did hee returne to Windsor, neither was any answer returned from the Lords. After this hee wrote two Letters, one in his owne name to the Earle of Warwicke, the other in the name of the Lords at Windsor to the Lords at London, in both which hee so weakly complained, expostulated, intreated, yeelded vnder their hand, as it was sufficient to haue breathed courage into any enimie once declared against him.

And indeed, hereupon the Lords forthwith published a proclamation vnder the hands of seuenteen persons, either for nobility or authority of office well regarded, wherein the causes of such calamities and losses as had lately before happened, not onely by inward diuisions which had cost the liues of many thousands of the Kings subiects, and threatned more, but also by the losse of diuers peeces beyond the seas, which had bene won by great aduantage of the late Kings person and consumption of his treasure; they perceiued that the only root from whence those mischiefes sprung, was the euill gouernment of the Lord Protector, whose pride, couetousnesse and ambition couered only his priuate ends, and therefore he was deeply busied in his spacious and specious buildings in the hottest times of warre against France and Scotland whilest the poore souldiers and seruitors of the King were vnpaid, and laboured to make himselfe strong in all countries, whilest within the realme lawes, iustice, and good order peruerter, provisions for the forts beyond the seas neglected, and the Kings subiects by most dangerous diuisions (by his means either raised or occasioned) much disquiet. That hereupon the Lords of the counsaile for preuenting aswell present dangers to the Kings person, as the vtter subuersion of the state of the realme, concluded to haue talked to him quietly, without disturbance to the King, or to the people, for reducing him to liue within reasonable limits, and for putting order for safety of the kings person, and preservation of the commonwealth of the realme, and so to haue passed ouer his most vnnaturall and traiterous deseruings without further extremities. But he knowing that he was vnable to answere for any part of his demeanour, began forthwith to spread false rumors, that certaine Lords had conspired against the Kings person, vnder pretence whereof hee leuied forces in a disordered vproare, albeit the treason rested in him and some other his complices, wherefore seeing he troubled the whole realme for accomplishing his traiterous ends, and vsed the King in his tender age for an instrument against himselfe, causing him to put his hand to many of his owne deuises, and to speake things tending to the destruction of himselfe they desired and in the Kings name charged all subiects not to obey any precepts, licenses or proclamations, whereunto the Protectors hand should be set, albeit he should abuse the Kings hand and seale vnto them, but to quit themselues vpon such proclamation as should proceede from the body of the counsaile, protesting therewith their faithfull hearts to the King and their loialty towards the people.

Instantly after the publishing of this proclamation the Lords directed their letters to Windsore, and addressed to the the King, another to the Protector, the third to the household which was openly read. The letter to the Protector was guilded ouer with many smooth words intimating faire promises and full of hope, but the other two did fully and fowly set forth his obstinacie, his auarice his ambition, his rash engagements into warres, in the Kings vnsetled, both age and estate, his negligences, his deceits, and all other insufficiencies mentioned before. Herewith Sr Robert Wingfield captaine of the garde was sent from the Lords to Windsore who so well perswaded the King both of the loyal affection of the Lords towards him and of their moderate desires against the protector (who then was in presence) that partly thereby but chiefly in regard of the turbulent times the Protector was removed from the Kings person, & a guard set vpon him vntill the next day, when the Lords at London were appointed to be there.

So the next day diuers of the counsell rode from London to Windsore, but the Earle of Warwick rode not with them, for he was a perfect Master of his craft: he had well learned to put others before him in dangerous actions, and in matters of mischief to be seene to doe least, when in very deed all moued from him. He had well learned of the ape to take nuts out of the fire with the pawe of the cat. These Lords coming before the King did againe runne ouer their complaints against the Protector, and also vnder colour of loue and duty aduise the King to beware of such as were both powerfull, ambitious, mischieuous and rich. Affirming that it would be better surety vnto him, if this great authority should be committed to many, who cannot so readily knit in, will or in action, as when the whole mannage resideth in one. In the end the Duke of Somerset (for hereafter he must be no otherwise called) was committed into their power and committed to custody in Beauchampe tower within the castle.

The next day he was brought to London as if he had bin a captaine caried in triumph. He rode through Holborne between betweene the Earles of Sarrehampton and of Huntington, and was followed with Lords and Gentlemen to the number of 300 mounted on horsebacke. At Holborne bridge certaine Aldermen attended on horsebacke, and the cittizens householders stood with halberds on all sides of the streets, through which he passed. At Soperlane he was received by the Maier, Sheriffes, Recorder and diuers Knights of especiall note, who with a great traine of officers and attendants bearing halbeards carryed him forth with to the Tower, all this was to beare in shew, both that the Duke was a dangerous man, and that the common both aide and applause concurred in his restraint.

Forthwith the King was brought to Hampton court, where all things being borne as done well, because nothing was ill taken, seauen of the Lords of the counsaile and 4 Knights were appointed by turnes to attend the Kings person. The Lords were the Marquis of Northampton the Earles of Warwicke and Arundell, the Lords Russell, S^r Iohn, and Wentworth, the knights were these S^r Andrew Dudley, S^r Edward Rogers, S^r Thomas Darcy, and S^r Thomas Worth. As for affaires of state the gouernment of them was referred to the whole body of the counsaile, Soone after the King rode to his house in Southmarke, (then called Suffolke place) & there dined all. After dinner he rode in great estate through the city to Westminster, as if the people should be giuen to vnderstand, that nothing was deminished either from the safety or glory of the King by imprisonment of the Duke.

And now when the Duke had breathed a small time in the tower, certaine Lords of the counsaile were sent vnto him, who after a shorte preface in such termes as hate and dissimulation could temper together, remembring how great the amity had beene betweene them, and of what continuance: Then acknowledging what offices & seruices he had done for the commonwealth, & yet enterlacing some errors & defects, wherewith they seemed to reproach him: Lastly they presented him certaine articles as from the residue of the priuy counsaile, desiring his present answer, whether hee would acknowledge them to be true, or else stand vpon his iustification. The articles objected against him were these.

1 That he tooke vpon him the office of Protector vpon expresse condition, that he should doe nothing in the Kings affaires, but by assent of the late Kings executors, or the greatest part of them.

2 That contrary to this condition he did hinder iustice, & subuert Lawes of his owne Authority, as well by letters, as by other commande.

3 That he caused diuers persons arrested and imprisoned for treason, murder, manslaughter, and felony to be discharged against the lawes and statutes of the realme.

4 That he appointed Exemptions for Armies and other officers for the weighty affaires of the king vnder his own writing and seale.

5 That he communed with Embassadors of other realmes alone of the weighty matters of the realme.

6 That he would raunt and reprove diuers of the kings most honourable counsaile for declaring their aduice in the Kings weighty affaires against his opinion, sometimes telling them that they were not worthy to sit in counsaile, and sometimes that he needed not to open weighty matters to them, and that if they were not agreeable to his opinion, he would discharge them.

7 That against law he held a court of request in his house and did enforce diuers to answer there for their freeholde & goods, did determine of the same.

8 That being no officer without the aduice of the counsaile, or most part of them, he did dispose offices of the Kings gift for money, grant leases, and wards, and presentations of Benefices pertaining to the King, gaue Bishopricks, and made sales of the Kings lands.

9 That he commanded Alchimie, and multiplication to be be practised, thereby to abase the Kings coine.

10 That diuers times he openly said that the nobility and gentry were the only cause of dearth. Whereupon the people rose to reforme matters of themselves.

11 That against the minde of the whole counsaile he caused proclamation to be made concerning enclosures, whereupon the people made diuers insurrections and detained many of the Kings subiects.

12 That he sent forth a commission with Articles annexed, concerning enclosures, commons, highways, cottages, and such like matters, giuing the commissioners authority to heare and determine those causes whereby the lawes and statutes of the realme were subuerted and much rebellion raised.

13 That he suffered rebells to assemble and lie armed in campe against the nobility and gentry of the realme without speedie repressing of them.

14 That he did comfort and encourage diuers rebells by giuing them money, and by promising them fees, rewards and seruises.

15 That he caused a proclamation to be made against law, and in fauour of the rebells, that none of them should be vexed or sued by any for their offences in their rebellion.

16 That in time of rebellion he said that he liked well the actions of the rebells, and that the auarice of gentlemen gaue occasion for the people to rise, and that it was better for them to dye then to perish for want.

17 That he said, the Lords of the Parliament were loath to reforme enclosures and other things, therefore the people had a good cause to reforme them themselves.

18 That after declaration of the defaults of Bouline and the pieces there by such as did surview them, he would neuer amend the same.

19 That he would not suffer the Kings pieces of Newhaun, and Blackesse to be furnished with men and provision, albeit he was aduertised of the defaults and aduised thereto by the Kings counsaile, whereby the French King was emboldened to attempt upon them.

20 That he would neither giue authority nor suffer noble men, and gentlemen to suppress rebels in time conuenient, but wrote to them to speake the rebels faire, and vse them gently.

21 That upon the fifth of October the present yeere at Hampton court for defence of his owne private causes, hee procured seditious bills to be written in counterfeit hands, and secretly to be dispersed into diuerse parts of the realme beginning thus, Good people, intending thereby to raise the Kings subjects to rebellion and open warre.

22 That the Kings priuy counsaile did consult at London to come to him, and moue him to reforme his gouernment, but he hearing of their assembly declared by his letters in diuers places, that they were high traitors to the King.

23 That he declared vnruly as well to the King as to other yong Lords attending his person, that the Lords at London intended to destroy the King, & desired the King neuer to forget, but to reuenge it, and required the yong Lords to put the King in remembrance thereof with intent to make sedition, and discorde betweene the King and his Nobles.

24 That at diuers times and places he said, the Lords of the counsell at London intend to kill mee, but if I dye the King shall dye, and if they famish mee, they shall famish him.

25 That of his owne head he remoued the King so sodainly from Hampton court to Windsor, without any prouision there made, that he was thereby not only in great feare but cast into a dangerous disease.

26 That by his letters he caused the Kings people to assemble in great numbers in Armor after the manner of warre to his aide and defence.

27 That he caused his seruants and friends at Hampton court & Windsor to be apparelled in the Kings armor, when the Kings seruants and garde went vnarmed.

28 That he intended to fly to Iornsey and Wales and laid rest horses, and men, and a boat to that purpose.

Now albeit there is little doubt but that some of these articles were meereley deuised, others enlarged, or wrested, or otherwise inforced by odious interpretation, yet the Duke subscribed with his owne hand, that hee did acknowledge his offences contained in them, and humbly vpon his knees submitted himselfe to the Kings mercie. That in like manner hee intreated the Lords to be a meanes to the King, that he would conceiue that his offences did proceed rather from negligence, rashnesse, or other indiscretion, than from any malicious thought tending to treason, and also that hee would take some gracious way with him, his wife and children, not according to extremitie of Lawes, but after his great clemencie and mercie. Written with my owne hand, 23. December, Anno 5^o. Edw. Regis.

To this I make no other defence, but intreat the Reader not to condemne him for perishing so weakly, and for that he, who should haue lost his life to preserve his honour, cast away both his life and honour together. Assuredly he was a man of a feeble stomacke, vnable to concoct any great fortune prosperous or aduerse: But as the iudgement of God, and malice of a man concurre often in one act, although it be easie to discern betweene them; so is it little to be maruelled, that he who thirsted after his brothers bloud, should find others to thirst after his; Notwithstanding for that present his bloud was respited, but hee was stripped of his great offices of being Protector, Treasurer and Marshall, lost all his goods, and receiued two thousand pound land, in which estate if he had continued, the longer he had liued, the more punishment he should endure, herewith it was scoffingly said that he had vanquished the Kings Goose, and did then regorge the feathers.

After this hee sent Letters to the Lords of the Councell, wherein hee acknowledged himselfe much fauoured by them, in that they had brought his cause to be fineable, which although it was to him importable, yet as hee did neuer intend to contend with them, nor any action to iustifie himselfe, as well for that he was none of the wisest, and might easily erre; as for that it is scarce possible for any man in great place so to beare himselfe, that all his actions in the eye of iustice shall be blamelesse; so he did then submit himselfe wholly to the Kings mercy. and their discretions for some moderation; desiring them to conceiue that what he did amisse was rather through rudenesse, and for want of iudgement, than from any malicious meaning, and that hee was therefore ready both to doe and suffer what they would appoint. Finally, he did againe most humbly vpon his knees intreat pardon, and fauour, and they should euer finde him so lowly to their Honours, and obedient to their orders, as he would thereby make amends for his former follies.

These subiections, obiections, deiections of the Duke made an heavenly harmonic in his enemies eares. But they wrought such compassion with the King, that forthwith he was released out of the Tower, his fines discharged, his goods and lands restored, except such as had beene giuen away, either the malice of the Lords being somewhat appeased, or their credit not of sufficient strength to resist, within a short time after he was entertained and feasted by the King with great shew of fauour, and sworne againe of the Priuie Councell, at which time betweene him and the Lords perfect amitie was made, or else a dissembling hate. And that all might appeare to be knit vp in a comicall conclusion, the Dukes daughter was afterwards ioyned in marriage to the Lord Lisle, sonne and heire to the Earle of Warwick, and the Earle also was made Lord Admirall of England, yet many doubted whether the Earle retained not some secret offence against the Duke, which if hee did, it was most cunningly suppressed, doubtlesse of all his vertues he made best vice of dissimulation. And as this friendship was drawne together by feare on both sides, so it was not like to be more durable than was the feare.

And thus the second attended of the tragedie of the Duke, the third shall follow in the proper place.

In the meane time the Earle of Warwicke for what mischeiuous contriuance it was not certainly knowne, but conceiued to be against the Duke ioined to him the Earle of Arundell late Lord Chamberlaine, and the Earle of Southhampton sometimes Lord Chantellor, men of their owne nature circumspect and slow, but at the time discountenanced and discontent, whom therefore the Earle of Warwicke singled as fittest for his purpose. Many secret conferences they had at their feuerall houses, which often held the greatest part of the night. But they accustomed to afford at other times either silence, or shorte assent to what he did propose, did then fall off and forsake him, procuring thereby danger to themselves without doing good to any other. For when the Earle of Warwicke could by no meanes draw them to his desires, hee found means that both of them were discharged from the counsell, and commanded to their houses. Against the Earle of Arundell obiections were framed that he tooke away bolts and locks at Westminster, and gaue away the Kings stufte. Hee was fined at 12000^l to be paid 1000^l yeerely. But doubtlesse the Earle of Warwicke had good reason to suspect, that they who had the honesty not to approue his purpose, would not want the heart to oppose against it.

During these combats among the nobility many popular insurrections were assayed, One Bell was put to death at Tyborne for mouing a new rebellion in Suffolke and in Essex; hee was a man nittily needy and therefore aduenturous, esteemed but an idle fellow, vntill he found opportunity to shew his rashnesse. Diuers like attempts were made in other places, but the authors were not so readily followed by the people as others had done before. Partly because multitudes doe not easily moue, but chisly because misadventures of others in like attempts had taught them to be more warily aduised. About this time a Parliament was was held at Westminster wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies the first motiue of rebellions, and another against unlawfull assemblies, the first apparant acting of them. But for feare of new tumults, the Parliament was vntimely dissolued and gent. charged to retire to their country habitations, being furnished with such forces and commissions as were held sufficient to hold in bridle either the malice or rage of reasonlesse people, yea so great grew the doubt of new insurrections that Trinity terme did not holde least gentlemen should by that occasion be drawn out of the country where they were esteemed to doe good seruice by keeping the Commons from commotions. All these mouements seemed to be pretended by mouing of the earth in diuerse places of Sussex.

The affaires of England beyond the seas all this time were caried with variable successe, S^t Thomas Cheynie was sent to the Emperour to treat with him, that his forces might ioine with the forces of England against the common enimies of them both according to the Articles formerly concluded. These articles had bin well obserued for a time espceially against the French. But afterwards the emperour being diuerted about other preparations, and therewith much solicited by the Scots, not to be a helpe to ruine their kingdome fell by degrees from the K. of England, filling his Embassadors with emptie hopes at the first, wherein also he daily fainted and failed in the end.

In France the King placed the Rhenegraue with diuers Regiments of Almaine, Lancequenots, and certaine ensignes of French to the number of 4 or 5000 at the towne of Morguison midway betweene Bouline and Calais to empeach all entercourse betweene those two places; wherevpon the King of England caused all the strangers that had serued the yeere against the rebells to the number of 2000 to be transported to Calais, to them were adioined 3000 English, vnder the command of Francis Earle of Huntingdon, & S^t Edward Hastings his brother to dislodge dislodge the French, or otherwise to annoy them. But the French perceiuing that the troubles in England were perfectly appeased; and that the King thereby was much strengthened in his estate, for that the vicious humors against him were either corrected or spent, finding also that he daily grew rather into admiration then loue, aswell for that it was apparant, that hee had so well improved that little stocke which his father left, as he was like to proue a thriuer in the end, also weary in maintaining warres with Scotland, as well in regard of the charge, as for that his people were nothing desirous of seruice in that distant country. Lastly hauing tried aswell the strength as curtesy of the English nation, and doubtfull of the estates of the empire and of Spaine, by whom not only the wings of his Kingdome had beene clipped on euery side, but the whole body tiereof dangerously attempted, he resolved to fasten peace with England if he could.

Herevpon he dispatched to the English court Guidotti an Italian borne in Florence who made many ouertures to the Lords of the counsaile, but all as from the Cunstable of France, and espying with a nimble eye that matters of counsaile were chiefly swayed by the Earle of Warwicke by great gifts and gretter hopes he wrought him to be appliable to his desires. In the end it was concluded that foure Embassadors should be sent from the King of England into France, and foure from the French King to treat with them that the English commissioners should come to Guisnes and the French to Arde, and that their meeting should be chiefly at Guisnes. The English yeelding to all with sincerity of minde, the French accepting all but with intentions reserued to themselves. The Lords appointed by the English were John Earle of Bedforde, William Lord Paget, S^r William Peeter, and S^r John Mason. Secretaries of State, on the French side were appointed Mounsier Rochpott, Mounsier Chastilion, Guillant de Mortier, and Rochetele de Daffie, in short time after the Earle of War- wick was made Lord great, Mr another feather to his mounting minde.

The day wherein the English Embassadors arrived at Calais, Guindoli resorted vnto them with a letter from Monsieur Rochpot whereby he signified that the French intended not to come to Arde, but desired that the English would goe to Bouline, and that the meeting might be besides the Towne. For this he alleadged that he was so weakly disposed in health that he could not trauaile farre, and that he being Gouernor of Picardie and Chastilion of Newhauen they might not depart such distance from their charge, and further that there must be much wast of time if the English should lye at Guisnes and the French at Ardes, and that the equality would be more, and the dishonour to one of the sides lesse, if the enterview should be vpon the Frontiers, then if one part should be drawen into the territory of the other.

Vpon this rubbe the English Embassadors thought fit to demurre, and so sent into England to receiue directions from the Lords of the counsaile. They againe referred the matter wholly to the iudgement of the Embassadors, affirming that it was a circumstance not much to bee stood vpon in case it were not vpon some finenesse, but for ease and commodity of them and their traine, which indeed they might better finde neere Bouline then at Ardes, in case also they could discern no deepe inconuenience which might hinder the good issue of the good busines in hande, which they esteemed sufficient if in substance it might be effected, albeit in all points they had not so much of their mindes, as they then desired, and as at another time they would expect, and so the English Commissioners went to Bouline, and the French came to one of their forts neere to Bouline.

Not long before the Emperour had beene assailed by the King of England to aide him in defence of Bouline against the French, which he expressly refused, alleaging that that he was not bound so to doe by conditions of the league. For that Bouline was a piece of new conquest acquired by the English since the league was made, then the King offered to yeelde the Towne absolutely into his hands in case he would maintaine it against the French, which offer also he refused to accept. At the arrivall of the English embassadors the souldiers were sharply assailed with wants. There was not one drop of beere in the Towne. The bread and breadcorne sufficed not for six daies. Herevpon the souldiers entred into proportion, and to giue them example the Lord Clinton being Lord Dèputie limited himselfe to a loose a day. The King was indebted in those parts aboue 14000^l besides for the Earle of Huntingdons numbers which were about 1300 foote, besides also the increases daily rising, for the monethly pay of English and strangers amounted to 6000^l besides allowance for officers. Hereof the band of horsemen out of Germany tooke little lesse then 800^l the moneth, and the Almains on foote 4000^l accounting the gulden at 3^l 4^d, but accounting it more, as without a higher valuation little seruice & happily some mischiefe might be expected, the monethly pay to strangers amounted higher. Hereby a great error was discovered, in that the strangers for defence of Bouline were of greater strength then were the English.

Now the English commissioners hauing first procured some releife both for victualls & pay, prepared a tent without the towne for meeting with the French. But they erected a house on the further side of the water within their owne territory, in a manner halfe way betweene their forte and the towne. The English perswaded the French to surcease their building, pretending but for their fantasies it was not necessarie, because neither their treaty was like to continue long, neither was it by solempne meeting that the business in hand must be effected. But in truth they feared least if peace should not follow, the French might in short time either with filling or massing the house, or else by fortifying rising make such a piece as might annoy the haven or the towne. Notwithstanding the French not only proceeded but refused any other place of enteruiew.

At their first meeting much time was spent in ceremony of salutation. Then the commissions were read, then M^r de Mortier in a sharpe speech declared that the French King their M^r had vpon iust grounds entred the warre for recouery of his right, and defence of his allies, yet was he well minded for an honourable peace, so as the things for which the warre began, might be brought to some reasonable appointment; and hearing of the like disposition of the King of England he had sent them to treat of those affaires, nothing doubting but that the English would accord to the restitution of Bouline, and other pieces of their late conquest, which so long as they should keepe, so long they may be assured the warre would continue. He further added that Bouline was but a bare ruinous Towne, without territory or any other commodity to ballance the charge of defending it against the power of France. Lastly he said there should want no good will in them to bring matters to good appointment, hoping to finde the like affection in the English.

After that the English commissioners had conferred a while, the Lord Paget answered that the causes of the warre both with them and their Allies (whom he tooke to be the Scots) being iust and honourable. The towne of Bouline & other pieces subdued aswell by their late great master against them, as by the K. their then M^r against their Allies were acquired by iust title of victory, and therefore in keeping of them no iniury was offered, either to the French King, or to the Scots. But the further declaration hee left off vntill their next meeting, because both the time was spent and the tide summoned them to departe. Touching the good inclination of the King their M^r hee had declared it well by sending them thither, in whom they should finde such good conformity, that if good successe ensued, not the fault should be which they expected not in the French. Nothing else was done sauing a surcease of hostility concluded for 15 daies, which was proclaimed in both the frontiers.

At the next meeting the Lord Paget spent much speech in setting forth the King of England's title to Bulloine and to his debts and pension from the French king, with all arrerages; together with the iustice of his warre against the Scots. The French were as earnest in maintaining the contrary, wanting no words whatsoever their reasons were. For betweene great Princes, the greatest strength carrieth the greatest reason. At the last M^r de Mortier roundly said that to cut off all contentions of words, he would propose two means for peace. All that for old matters of pensions, debts and arrerages, the English should make white books and neuer mention them more, but for Bulloine to set the higher value, (or else said he) let old quarrells remaine, so as your right may be reserued to clime, and ours to defende. And let vs speake frankly of some recompence for Baulloine. As for the Scottish Queene. (For this had beene also mentioned before) our King is resolved to keepe her for his sonne and therefore we desire you to speake thereof no more, but of what other points you please, so as we may draw shortly to an end.

The Lord Paget answered for the other commissioners that they had greatest reason to desire a speedy end, but the matters whereupon they stood were of greater importance then to be determined vpon the sodaine. For said he you may make doubts as you please. But if the debt to our King be not iust, being confessed, iudged, sworne; and by many treaties confirmed, wee know not what may be deemed iust, neither is it a summe to be slenderly regarded being 2000000 crownes cleere debt, besides 12000 crowns resting in dispute. The iustice of the warres against Scotland he maintained aswell in regarde of breach of treatise with themselves as for that contrarie to their comprehension sion in the last treaty of France they had inuaded England in these entercourses, the whole afternoone being spent, it was agreed that both parties should advise vpon such matters as had beene propounded vntill the next meeting.

But the French either hauing or supposing that they had aduantage ouer the English partly by reason of their firme intelligence in the English court, and partly because they found the English commissioners much yeelding to their desires, as first in cumming into France, then to Bouline, lastly to a house of their owne erecting began to be stiffe and almost intractable, sharply pressing both for speedie resolution and short times for meetings. But Guidolti continually traualled to draw both parties to conformity, the French being willing to be entreated by their friend to their most dissembled desires. Guidolti in steed of the Queene of Scots propounded that the French kings daughter should bee ioyned in marriage to the King of England, affirming that if it were a drie peace, it would hardly be durable, but hereto the English gaue no inclinable care. Then he deliuered 17 reasons in writing, for which he said it was necessarie for the English to conclude a peace. The English demanded how many reasons he had for the French; he answered that he had also his reasons for them, which he intended likewise to deliuer in writing.

At the next meeting the French shewed themselves as before peremptory and precise, standing stiffly vpon their owne ouertures, which they had they said no commission to exceede, and therefore they refused to treat either of the pension or debt demanded by the English, and declared themselves rather desirous then willing to breake off the treaty. The English answered that before their comming Guidolti had declared from the French King that so as Bulloine might be rendred, all that was owing from him to the King of England should be paid, which Guidolti being present affirmed to be true; well said they what our King told Guidetti we know not, but to vs hee hath giuen no other commission then you haue heard, which in no case wee must exceede. As for the pension whereof you speake, thinke you that a King of France will be tributary to any? No, No, assure you he will not, and touching the debt because the K. of England gaue occasion to the warres wasted the French Kings countrey, & thereby caused him to expend such summes of mony as exceeded the debt, he tooke himselfe to be acquitted thereof.

Hereto the English answered that the French King might take matters as he pleased, but in honour iustice, and conscience no debt was more due, and the warres being made for deniall thereof, he could not be for that cause acquitted. That the pension was also granted vpon diuers causes both weighty and iust, and amongst other by reason of the King of Englands vncontrouleable title to Normandie Gascoine and other parts of France. Here they were interrupted by Mr Rotchpot, who brake forth into warme words, and was againe as warmly answered, but the French would nothing moue from their owne ouertures which they stood vpon by way of conclusions.

At the last the English said that they might doe well to report these differences to their Masters on both sides & that their pleasures might therein be knowne. Hereto the French answered that they knew their Kings pleasures so well, that if they should send to him againe, he would and might thinke them of small discretion. and herewith they offered to breake. The English told them that if they would breake they might, but they intended to conclude nothing vntill they had further instructions from England; which they would procure as soone as they could. To this the French did easily incline.

These matters aduertised into England much troubled the counsaile, and the rather for that the Earle of Warwicke was at that time retired, pretending much infirmity in his health. Hereupon many sinister surmises began to spring vp among some of the counsaile, partly probable & parte happily deuiled, for as they knew not whether hee were more dangerous present or away; so as the nature of all feare is they suspected that which happened to be the worst. From hence diuerse of the counsaile began in this manner to murmure against him.

What said they is he neuer sicke, but when affaires of greatest weight are in debating? Or wherefore else doth hee withdraw himselfe from the company of those who are not well assured of his loue? Wherefore doth he not now come forth and openly ouerrule, as in other matters hee is accustomed? Would he haue vs imagine by his absence that he doeth nothing? Or knowing that all moueth from him, shall wee not thinke that he seeketh to enioy his owne ends, which bearing blame for any euent? Goe to then; let him come forth and declare himselfe, for it is better that should finde fault with all things whilest they are doing, then condemne all things when they are done; with those and the like speeches he came to counsaile more ordinary then before, and at last partly by his reasons and partly by his authority, peace with France was esteemed so necessarie, that new instructions were sent to the English Embassadors, according whereto peace was concluded vpon these articles.

1 That all titles and climes on the one side and defences on the other should remaine to either party as they were before.

2 That the faulte of one man (except he were unpunished) should not breake the peace.

3 That prisoners should be deliuered on both sides.

4 That Bouline and other pieces of the new conquest, with all the ordinance except such as had bene brought in the English should be deliuered to the French within 6 moneths after the peace proclaimed.

5 That ships of merchandise might safely passe and ships of warre be called in.

6 That the French should pay for the same 200000 crownes of the summe, euery crowne valued at six shillings 8d within within three daies after the deliuey of the towne, & 200000 like crownes more vpon the fifth day of August then next ensuing.

7 That the English should make no new warres vpon Scotland, vnlesse new occasions should be giuen.

8 That if the Scots rased Lords and Dungalasse, the English should rase Roxborough and Aymouth, and no fortification to be afterwards made in any of those places.

To these articles the French King was sworne at Amiens, the King of England at London; Commissioners being especially appointed to take their oaths, and for further assurance 6 Hostages were deliuered for the French at Ards and 6 for the English at Guisnes, and it was agreed that at the deliuey of Bulloine the English hostages should be discharged, & that vpon the paiment of the first 200000 crownes 3 of the French hostages should be discharged, and other 3 vpon paiment of the last 200000 crownes. In the peace the Emperor was comprised in case he would consent, and further to cut off future contentions, commissioners were appointed both by the English and French to make certaine the limits betweene both territories. Other commissioners were appointed summarily to expedite and determine all matters of piracie and depredations betweene the subiects of both kingdoms, whereby many had not only liued but thriued many years before.

So the Lord Clinton gouernor of Bulloine hauing receiued his warrant, discharged all his men except 1800 and with them issued out of the towne, and deliuered it to Mr Chastilion hauing first receiued of him the 6 English hostages, and an acquittance for deliuey of the towne, and safe conduct for his passage to Calais. These 18000 men were afterwards placed vpon the frontires betweene the Emperor and the English. Soone after the first paiment of money was made by the French to certaine English commissioners wherevpon 3 of their hostages were discharged, the other three namely Count de Anguien next heire to the crowne of France after the Kings children, the Marquis de Meaux brother to the Scottish Queene, and Montmorencie the constables sonne who at that time chiefly guided the affaires of France, came into England. They were honourably accompanied and with great estate brought to London, where euery of them kept house by himselfe.

Of the monies of the first paiement 10000^l was appointed for Calais 8000^l for Ireland, 10000^l for the North, and 2000^l for the Naui, the residue was carefully laid vp in the Tower. Likewise of the second paiement (wherevpon the hostages aforesaid returned into France) 8000^l was appointed for Calais 5000^l for the North, 10000^l was employed for encrease towards outward payments, certaine persons vnder taking that the mony should bee doubled euery * moneth, the residue was safely lodged in the tower.

* Or hap-
pely yeare,

And now it remained that the chiefe actors in this peace (whatsoeuer their aimes were) must be both honoured & enriched with great rewards, & first Guidolti the first mouer of the treaty was recompenced with knighthood, 1000 crownes rewards, 1000 crownes pension & 250^o pensio to his sonne. The Earle of Warwicke was made generall warden of the North, had 1000 markes land granted to him and 100 horsemen of the Kings charge. M^r Herbert his chiefe instrument was made * president of Wales and had a grant of 500^l land, and thus whether immoderate fauours breed first vnthankfulnesse and afterwards hate, and therewith ambitious desires, or whether God so punisheth immoderate affections, it often happeneth that men are prone to raise those most who worke their ruine in the end. Also the Lord Clinton who had beene deputie of Bulloine was made Lord Admirall of England. The captains and officers were rewarded with lands, leases, offices and annuities, the ordinary souldiers hauing all their pay, and a moneths pay ouer were sent into their countries, and great charge charge giuen that they should be well obserued, vntill they were quietly settled at home. The light horsemen & men at armes were put vnder the Marquis of Northampton capitaine of the Pensioners. All the garde of Bulloine were committed to the Lord Admirall. The chiefe capitaines with 600 ordinaries were sent to strengthen the Frontiers of Scotland. Lastly strangers were dispatched out of the realme, who after some idle expence of their monies & time were likest to be forward either in beginning or in maintaining disorders.

Presently after this agreement of peace. The Duke of Brunswicke sent to the King of England to offer his seruice in the Kings warres with 10000 men of his bande, and to entreat a marriage with the Lady Mary the Kings eldest sister. Answer was made touching his offer of aide, that the Kings warres were ended. And touching marriage with the Lady Mary that the King was in speech for her marriage with the Infanta of Portugall, which being determined without effect, he should fauourably be heard. Vpon this also the Emperors Embassadors did expostulate with the King that he had broke his league with the Emperor. To this the King answered that because the Emperor failed in his performances the King was enforced to prouide for himselfe. The Embassador desirous as it seemed to make a breach, demanded boldly that the Lady Mary should haue the free exercise of the masse. This did the King not only constantly deny, but herevpon sermons were encreased at court and order taken that no man should haue any benefice from the King but first he should preach before him, and in short time after vnder pretence of preparing for sea matters 5000^l were sent to relieue Protestants beyond the seas, and further because the Emperor made diuers streight lawes against those of the religion. Merchants were charged to forbear their trade into Flanders so much as they could. So as it appeares, had some of the English nobility beene either lesse powerfull or more faithfull then they were, the King had cares enough and hands enough aswell at home as among good friends abroad, either to haue maintained warres against the French or to haue reduced them to a more honourable peace.

Warres being thus at good appointment, peaceable busines was more seriously regarded, and whereas an Embassador arriued from Gostane King of Sweden to knit amity with the King for entercourse of merchants. At last these articles were concluded.

1 That if the King of Sweden sent Bullion into England he might carry away English commodities without custome.

2 That he should carry Bullion to no other Prince.

3 That if he sent Ozimus, Steele, copper, &c. he should pay custome for English commodities as an English man.

4 That if he sent other merchandise he should haue free entercourse paying custome as a stranger.

The mint was set to worke so as it gained 24000^l yearly to the King, which should beare his charges in Ireland and bring 10000^l to the treasure. 400 men were sent into Ireland and charge giuen that the lawes of England should there be administred, & the mutinous be seuerely suppressed. Verily it may see ne strange that among all the horrible hurries in England, Ireland was then almost quiet. But besides that the King drew much people from thence for seruice in his warres, who happely would not haue remained quiet at home, the gouernors at that time were men of such choice, that neither the nobility disdained to endure their commande, nor the inferior sort were suppressed to supply their wants.

Further 20000^l weight was appointed to be made so much baser as the King might gaine thereby 160000^l. Agreement was also made with Torke Mr. of one of the mints, that he should receiue the profit of all the Bullion which himselfe should bring, and pay the Kings debts to the value of 120000^l and remaine accountable for the rest, paying six shillings 8^d the ounce vntill the exchange were equal equall in Flanders and afterwards six shillings 8^d and further that he should declare his bargaine to any that should be appointed to ouersee him, and leaue off when the King should please, that for this the King should giue him 15000^l in preft, and license to transport 8000^l beyond the seas to abase the exchange. Herewith the base monies formerly coined were cried downe.

Now it is certaine that by reason of the long hostility which England held against Scotland and France, peace was not so hardly concluded as kept. But albeit occasions of breach were often offered, yet the iudgement & moderation of both parts sufficed either to auoide or appease them. The Bishop of Glasco comming into England without safe conduct was taken prisoner. The French Embassador made means to the King for his discharge, but answere was made that the Scots had no such peace with the English that they might passe without safe conduct. This was not denied by the M^r of Erskine, whereupon the Archbishop was retained prisoner, but after a short time remitted to his liberty. After this the Queene Dowager of Scotland going from France to her countrey, passed through England but the French Embassador first obtained her safe conduct, she arriued at Portsmouth and was there encountred by diuers of the English nobility of highest quality and estimation as well for doing her honour as for that hauing such pledges she neede not feare, at London she sojourned 4 daies being lodged in the Bishops pallace, and defraied at the charge of the Citty, in which time she was roially feasted by the King at Whitehall. At her departure she was attended out of the Citty with all ceremonies pretending to state; the Sheriffes of euery shire through which she passed receiued her accompanied with the chiefe gentlemen of the countrey, as also they conueied her from one shire to another (making alwaies prouision for her entertainment vntill shee came into the borders of Scotland).

The Earle of Maxwell came with a strong hand to the borders borders of England, against certaine families of Scots who had yeelded to the King of England, and the Lord Dacre brought his forces to their aide, in which seruice his valour and discretion did equally appeare. For albeit the gentlemen of those families did often skirmish with the Earles men; and slew many of them, yet were they neuer therein aided by the English, neither would they assaile him vpon any aduantage. But when any of these gentlemen were distressed by the Earle the English did then encounter him by armes. Generally the English would not offer to offend the Scots, but only in defending their friends.

About this time the French king sent Monsieur Lansat to request of the King of England, that the fishing of Tweede, Edrington, the debatable ground, and the Scottish Hostages which had beene sent into England in the time of King Henry the 8th might be restored to the Scots, and that the English prisoners who were bound to pay their ransomes, before the peace should not be comprised in the conditions thereof. The King sent S^r William Pickering to declare to the French King, that to the last demand he agreed without exception, and albeit he had to the places required, yet he was content as well for them as for other demands, to performe whatsoeuer should be agreed on by commissioners on both sides, so commissioners were appointed and the matters setled in quiet agreement.

In the meane time the King sent new supply of forces and other prouisions into the North parts of the Realme, wherevpon the French King sent a nauie of 160 saile into Scotland, laden with graine, powder, and ordinance, of these 16 of the greatest perished vpon the coast of Ireland, two charged with Artillery and 14 with graine, the residue so shaken and torne, that it gaue a maine checke to their further designes, but because many saued themselves in the harbors of Ireland. The King sent thither 4 ships, 4 barkes, 4 pinnaces, and 12 victualers. These possessed themselves of three hauens, two on the south side towards France and one towards Scotland. The Lord Cobham was appointed Generall lieutenant, who fortified those hauens and drew downe the chiefeſt forces of the country towards the south parts thereof, and thus euen in peace either of the Kings ſo vigilantly obſerued euery motion of the other, as if they had liued vpon the Alarme. The will of friends is beſt aſſured when they haue no power to doe hurt.

In France a difference did riſe about a place called Fines wood, whether it pertained to the English or to the French. On the French part 800 men aſſembled at armes vpon this quarrell, on the English 1000. But the readines of the English to fight moued the French to abſtaine from blowes, and to permit the English to enioy their ground. Herevpon the King fortified Calais and his other pieces in France, in ſuch ſort as they had neuer beene in like condition of defence. And whereas one Stryward a Scot was apprehended in England and imprifoned in the Tower, for intending to poiſon the young Queene of Scots, the King as well to manifeſt his iuſtice as his loue and reſpect towards the young Queene, deliuered him to the French King vpon the frontiers of Calais to be iuſticed by him at his pleaſure.

And yet this aduice was not approued by many, for albeit it be both honourable and iuſt, that they who offend againſt their proper prince, ſhould be deliuered to him to be puniſhed, yet is it growne out of common uſe. And for this cauſe the condition is often expreſſed in leagues, that the ſubiects of one Prince ſhould be deliuered by the other in caſe they be required, the contrary cuſtome may happily holde reaſonable in ordinary offences, in which caſe the Scripture forbiddeth to deliuer a ſlaue to his angrie Lord, but in grieuous and inhumane crimes, in ſuch as ouerthrow the foundation of ſtate, in ſuch as ſhake the ſurety of humane ſociety, I conceiue it more fit that offenders ſhould be remitted to their Prince to be puniſhed in the place where they haue offended.

But of all other the Kings amity with the Emperor was least assured, being as fullest both of practise and distrust, so in danger euery houre to dissolue. Certaine ships were appointed in the Lowe Countreys with men and furniture futable to the attempts to transport the Lady Mary either by violence or by stealth out of England to Antwerpe. Diuerse of her gentlemen departed thither before, and certaine shipheres as they are termed, were discouered to view the English coast. Hereupon S^r John Gates was sent with forces into Essex where the Lady then lay, and besides, the Duke of Somerset was sent with 200 men, the Lord Priuy seale with other 200, and M^r Sentlegier with 400 men more to seuerall coasts vpon the sea; diuerse of the Kings ships were addrested to be in readines for the sea. M^r Chamberlaine Embassador for the Queene of Hungarie in the Lowe Countreys aduertised by his letters, that it was intended by this means to raise an outward warre to ioine with some sedition within dores, & that the Queene of Hungarie had openly saide, that the Shipheres were towards; who for feare of one gentleman durst not proceede in their attempt. Vpon these either dangers or feares the Lord Chancellor & Secretary Peeter were sent to the Lady Mary, who after some conference brought her to the Lord Chancellors house at Lyes in Essex and from thence to Hunsdon. and from thence to the King at Westminster. Here the counsell declared vnto her how long he had permitted her the vse of the Masse, and perceiuing by her letters how vn moueable she was, he was resolued no longer to endure it, vnlesse she would put in hope of some conformity within short time. To this she answered that her soule was Gods, and touching her faith as shee could not change so she would not dissemble it. Reply was made that the King intended not to constrain her faith, but to restrain the outward profession thereof, in regard of the danger the example might draw. After some other like interchange of speeces the Ladie was appointed to remaine with with the King, but Dr Mallet her chaplaine was committed prisoner to the fleet, and almost herewith arrived an Embassador from the Emperor, with a menacing message of warre, in case his cozen the Lady Mary should not be admitted the free exercise of the masse. The King presently advised with the Archbishop of Canterburie, and with the Bishops of London and Rochester who gave their opinion that to give license to sinne was sinne, but to continue at sinne might be allowed in case it were neither too long nor without hope of reformation. Then was answer given to the Embassador that the King would send to the Emperor within a moneth or two to give him what satisfaction should be fit.

In the meane time the counsaile considering how prejudiciall it would be to the realme if the subiects should loose their trade in Flanders, that the Flemmings had cloath for a yeere in their hands, that the King had 300. quintals of powder and much armor in Flanders, and the merchants much goods at the woll fleet, they advised the King to send an Embassador legier for the Emperor, as well to satisfie him for other matters by him required, as to winne time, thereby both to prepare a mart in England and to withdraw their goods out of Flanders. So M^r Wotton was dispatched with particuler instructions to desire the Emperor to be lesse violent in his requests. And to aduertise him that the Lady Mary as she was his cozen, so was she the Kings sister, and which is more his subiect, that seeing the K. was a soueraigne Prince without dependancy vpon any but God, it was not reason that the Emperor should entermiddle either with ordering his subiects, or with directing the affaires of his realme. Thus much he offered, that what fauour the Kings subiects had in the Emperors dominions for their religion, the same should the Emperors subiects receive in England. The Emperor perceiuing that his threats were little regarded, regarded little to threaten any more.

About the time that the Lady Mary should haue beene transported vnto Antwerp, a rebellion was attempted in Essex where she then lay. For furtherance whereof speeches were cast forth, that strangers were arrived in England, either to rule or to spoile the naturall inhabitants, vpon this surmise many appointed to assemble at Chelmsford, and from thence to make pillage as their wants or wanton appetites should leade, but the Principall being put to death and the residue pardoned, all remained quiet. Many Londoners also hunting after riot and ease, contriued to tumult vpon May day, pretending grieuances and fears from strangers, but because where many are of counsaile counsell is hardly kept, the enterprize was discouered and defeated before it was ripe, herewith Lyon, Gorran & Ireland persons of meane condition but desperate and discontent, endeauoured to raise a rebellion in Kent. They often met and had conferences both priuate and long. They seemed highly busied in minde, and their heads trauiailing with troubled thoughts, which they often dissimbled with impertinent speeches, this was first discouered by one of their seruants, doubtfull whether before knowing the mischiese, and vntill then secret or ignorant before, and then first apprehending suspitions. So they were apprehended and after conuiction the danger determined by their deaths. Herewith rumors were raised of great discord and practises among the nobility, for this cause the Lords assembled at London, and fasted diuers daies together, giuing order to apprehend the reporters of these surmises, albeit happely not altogether vntue. For this cause gentlemen were newly commanded to remaine in the countrey, to gouerne the people easy to be dealt with whilest they stand in feare.

The King being thus vncertaine of the faith both of his subiects and of his confederats, intended by aliance to strengthen himselfe. To this purpose one Bortwicke was sent to the King of Denmarke with priuate instructions to treat of a marriage betweene the Lady Elizabeth the Kings sister and the *King of Denmark*s eldest sonne. But this Lady albeit she was furnished with many excellent endowments both of nature and education, yet could shee neuer be induced to entertaine Marriage with any.

After this the Lord Marquis of Northampton was directed with a solemne embassage to the French King, aswell to present him with the order of the garter, as to treat with him of other secret affaires, with him were ioyned in commission the Bishop of Elie, St Phillip Hobbie, St William Pickering, St Iohn Mason knights, and Mr Smith secretary of state. The Earles of Worcester, Rutland, and Ormond were appointed to accompany them, and likewise the Lords Lisle, Finswater, Bray, Aberganewie, and Tuers, with other knights and gentlemen of note to the number of 26 and for auoiding immoderate and burthensome traine, order was giuen that euery Earle should haue foure attendants, euery Lord three, euery Knight and Gentleman two, The commissioners were not limited to any number.

They arriued at Nants and were there receiued by Mounſier Chaſtilion and by him conducted to Chasteau Bryan where the French King then lodged, they were twice banquetted by the way, and the neerer they approached to the castle, the more encreased the resort of the French nobility to doe them honour, being come to the court they were forthwith brought to the King abiding then in his bedchamber. Here the Marquis presented vnto him the order of the garter, wherewith he was presently inuested, and thereupon gaue for the garter a chaine worth 200^l and his gowne addresssed with aglets esteemed worth 25^l.

Then the Bishop of Ely in a short speech declared how desirous the King of England was not only to continue but to encrease amity with the French King. That to this purpose he had sent the order of the garter to be both a testimony and tye of loue betweene them, to which purpose pose chiefly those societies of honour were first deuised. He further declared that they had commission to make ouerture of some other matters, which was like to make the concord betweene the Kinges & their realmes not only more durable, but in all expectation perpetuall desiring the King to appoint some persons enabled with authority to treat with them.

To this speech the Cardinall of Lorraine answered that the French King was ready to apprehend and embrace all offers tending to encrease of amity, and the rather for that long hostility had made their new friendship both more weake in it selfe, & more obnoxious to ielosies & distrusts, and therefore he promised on the Kings behalfe that commissioners should be appointed to treat with them about any matters which they had in charge, praying to God that it might be a means not only to assure but to enlarge their late settled loue, so a commission went forth to the Cardinall of Lorraine and Chastillon the Constable, the Duke of Guise and certaine others; at the first the Englisch demanded that the young Queene of Scots might be sent into England for perfection of marriage betweene K. Edward and her, but hereto the French answered that they had taken too much aduenture, and spent too many liues vpon any conditions to let her goe, and that conclusion had beene made long before for her marriage with the Dolphine of France. Then the Englisch proposed a marriage between their King and the Lady Elizabeth the French Kings eldest daughter, to which the French did cheerefully encline.

So after agreement that neither partie should be bound either in conscience or in honour vntill the Ladie should accomplish 12 yeares of age, they fell to treat of the portion which should be giuen with her in marriage. The Englisch first demanded 150000 crownes, and offered that her dowrie should be so great as K. Henry the 8th had giuen with any of his wiues. The offer of dower was not diliked.

ked; but for the portion some of the French wondred, others smiled, that so great a summe should be demanded. The English descended to 1400000 crownes & after by degrees fell so low as 800000, but the French as they held the first summe to be vnreasonable, so all the other they esteemed excessive. Then the English demanded what the French would giue, first they offered 100000 crownes, afterwards 100000, which they said was the most & more the euer had bin giuen with a daughter of France, they followed a stiffe contention both by reasons, & precedents, but the French in no case would rise any higher, only they agreed that the French K. at his proper charge should send her to the K. of England 3 moneths before she should accomplish her age for marriage, sufficiently appointed with Jewells, apparell, & furniture for house, & that bands for the performances should then be deliuered at London by the K. of England and at Paris by the French King, and that in case the Lady should not consent after she should be of the said age for marriage, the penalty should be 150000 crownes, the French set downe these offers in writing, and sent them to the King of England.

- Soone after Monsieur le Marshall and other commissioners were sent by the French King into England, where they arriued at such time as the sweating sicknesse was most furious, a new strange & violent disease; for if a man were attached therewith he dyed or escaped within 9. houres, or 10 at the most. if he tooke cold he dyed within 3. houres. if he slept within 6. houres (as he should be desirous to doe) he dyed rauiing, albeit in other burning diseases that distemper is commonly appeased with sleepe. It raged cheifly among men of strongest constitution and yeares, of whom 120. perished in some one day within the liberties of London few aged men or children or women died thereof. Two of Charles Brandons sonnes, both Dukes of Suffolke, one of the Kings Gentlemen and one of his groomes died of this disease. For which cause the King removed to Hampton court with very few followers.

The same day the Marshall and other French commissioners were brought by the Lord Clinton Lord Admirall of England from Grauesend to London. They were saluted by the way with all the shot of more then 50 of the Kings great ships, and with a faire peale of Artillery from the Tower, and lastly were lodged in Suffolke pallace in Southwarke, and albeit they had more then 400. gentlemen in their traine, yet was not one of them nor any other stranger in England touched with the sweating disease, and yet the English were chased therewith not only in England, but in other countries abroad, which made them like tyrants both feared and auoided wherefoeuer they came.

The next day the French were removed to Richmond whence every day they resorted to Hampton court, where the King remained, the first day after they had performed the Ceremonies of court, and deliuered to the King their letters of credence, they were led to a chamber richly furnished for their repose, the same day they dined with the King, and after dinner being brought into an inner chamber, the Marshall declared that they were come not only to deliuer vnto him the order of S^t Michaell, but therewith to manifest the entire loue which the King his Master beare him, which he desired him to conceiue to be no lesse then a father can beare to his naturall sonne. That albeit diuers persons either witlesse or malicious raise diuers vaine rumors to draw the King as it is thought from his Masters friendship, yet he trusted that the King would not listen vnto them. That it much concerned the common quiet, that good officers be placed vpon the Frontiers, for as good may doe good in moderating things amisse, so euill will doe euill albeit no bad occasion be offered. Lastly he desired in case any new controuersie should arise it might be determined by commissioners on both sides and not by conflicts the parent of warre.

To this the King both suddenly and shortly answered, that he much thanked the French King for his order, as for the large expression of his loue, which he would be ready in all points to requite. Touching rumours they are many wayes to be credited, nor alwayes to be contemned, it being no lesse vaine to feare all things, than dangerous to doubt of nothing, and in case at any time hee listned to them, it was only to provide against the worst, and neuer to breake into hostilitie: concerning officers, he appointed such as hee esteemed good, and yet preferred the ouer-doubtfull before the ouer-credulous and secure, new controuersies he would alwayes be readie to determine by reason rather than by force, so farre as his honour should not thereby be diminished.

The French after this returne to their lodging at Richmond, and the next day resorted againe to the King, inuested him with garments of the order, and accompanied him to the Chappell, the King going betwene the Marshall & de Guise, both which after the Communion kissing his cheek. The residue of that day and a few dayes following were passed ouer with pastimes and feasts. At the last the Lord Marquis of Northampton and the residue, who had beene formerly sent with commission from the King into France, were appointed to treat with the French Commissioners touching the great matters of their Embassage. And because the French could be serued no higher than their offer of 200000. crownes it was accepted. The one moitie to be paid vpon the day of marriage, and the other six moneths after, the Dote was agreed to be 10000. markes of English money, and not to be paid in case the King should die before marriage. This agreement was reduced into writing, and deliuered vnder Scale on both sides: at the same time an Embassador arriued out of Scotland, to demand an exemplification of the articles of peace betwene England and France, vnder the great Scale of England, which without any difficultie they obtained.

The Marshall, at his taking leaue, declared to the King how kindly his Master did conceiue of the Kings readiness to conclude this treaty, and also commended his Majesties great inclination to the agreeinents thereof. Then he presented Mounfier Boys to be Embassador Legier for the French, and the Marquis presented Mr. Pickering to be Embassador for the King of England in France. The reward of the Marshall was three thousand pound in gold, besides a Diamond taken from the Kings finger, esteemed worth an hundred and fifty pound; Mounfier de Guy had 1000^l. Mounfier Chenault 1000^l. Mr. Mortuillier 500^l. the Secretary 500^l. and the Bishop of Periguer 500^l. The feastings were exceeding sumptuous, and at their returne they were wasted ouer the seas by certaine of the Kings ships, by reason of the wars betweene the Emperour and the French King. The Lord Marquis reward was afterwards deliuered at Paris, worth 500^l. the Bishop of Ely 200^l. Sir Philip Hobbies 150^l. and so were the rewards of the rest.

Now the King supposing his estate to be most safe, when indeed it was most vnsecure. In testimony both of his ioy and of his loue aduanced many to new titles of Honour. The Lord Marquis Dorset, a man for his harmelesse simplicitie, neither mistaked nor much regarded, was created Duke of Suffolke, the Earle of Warwick was created Duke of Northumberland, the Earle of Wiltshire was created Marquis of Winchester, Sir William Herbert, Lord of Cardiffe, was created Earle of Pembroke, Sir Thomas Darcie, Vice-chamberlaine, and Captaine of the Guard, was created Lord Darcie; William Cecil was made one of the chiefe Secretaries; Master John Cheeke, the Kings Schoole-master, and one of the guides of his industrie and hope, and with him Mr. Henry Dudley, and Mr. Henry Nenill of the Priuie Chamber, were made Knights, and which was the accomplishment of mischiese, Sir Robert Dudley one of the *Duke of Northumberland*s sonnes, a true heire both of his hate against persons of Nobility & of his cunning cunning to dissemble the same, was sworne one of the 'six ordinary Gentlemen, he was afterwards for lust and cruelty a monster of the court, as apt to hate, so a most sure executioner of his hate, yet rather by practise then by open dealing, as wanting rather courage then wit. After his entertainment into a place of so neere service the King enjoyed his health not long.

The Duke of Northumberland being now inferior vnto none of the nobility in title of honour, and superior to all in authority and power could not reſtraine his haughty hopes from aspiring to an absolute command. But before he would directly leuill at his marke, the Duke of Somerset was thought fit to be taken away, whose credid was so great, with the common people, that although it sufficed not to beare out any bad attempt of his owne, yet was it of force to crosse the euill purposes of others.

And now to begin the third act of his tragedie, speeches were cast that he caused himselfe to be proclaimed King in diuers countries, which albeit they were knowne to be false, inſomuch as the millers ſeruant at Battlebridge in Southwarke lost both his yeares vpon a pillory for so reporting, yet the very naming of him to be King, either as desired by himselfe or by others esteemed worthy, brought with it a distastfull relish apt to apprehend suspicion to be true.

After this he was charged to haue persuaded diuers of the nobility to chooſe him Protector at the next parliament. The Duke being questioned, neither held silence as he might nor constantly denie it, but entangled himselfe in his doubtfull tale. One Whaly a busy headed man, and desirous to be set on worke gaue first light to this appeachment, but the Earle of Rutland did stoutly auouch it.

Herewith S^r Thomas Palmer a man neither louing the Duke of Somerset nor beloued of him, was brought by the Duke of Northumberland to the King, being in his garden.

Heere he declared that vpon S^t George day last before, the Duke of Somerset being vpon a iourney towards the North, in case S^t William Herbert M^r of the horse had not assured him that he should receiue no harme, would haue raised the people, and that he had sent the Lord Gray before to know who would be his friends, also that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marques of Northampton, the Earle of Pembroke, and other Lords should be inuited to a banquet, and if they came with a bare company to be set vpon by the way, if strongly, their heads should haue beene cut off at the place of their feasting, he declared further that S^t Ralph Vane had 2000 men in a readinesse, that S^t Thomas Arundell had assured the tower, that Seymor and Hamond would waite vpon him, and that all the horse of the Gendarmorie should be slaine. To this M^r Secretary Cecill added, that the Duke had sent for him and said that he suspected some ill meaning against him, whereto M^r Secretary answered, that if he were not in fault, hee might trust to his innocencie, if he were, he had nothing to say but to lament him.

The Duke being aduertised of these informations against him by some who had some regard of honestie did forthwith desie the Secretary by his letters. Then he sent for Sir Thomas Palmer, to vnderstand what he had reported of him, who denied all that he had said, but by this hot & humorous striuing he did but draw the knots more fast.

A few daies being passed the Duke either ignorant of what was intended, or fearing if he seemed to perceiue it, came to the court, but somewhat later then he accustomed, and as too mindes possessed with feare, all things vnusuall seeme to menace danger, so this late coming of the Duke was enforced as a suspicion against him, and so after dinner he was apprehended. Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir Thomas Arundell, Hamond, Nadigates, John Seymor and David Seymer were also made prisoners, the Lord Gray being newly come out of the country was attached. S^t Ralph Vane being ing twice sent for fled, vpon the first message it was reported that he said that his Lord was not stout, and that if he could get home he cared not for any, but vpon pursuit he was found in his seruants stable at Lambeth couered with straw, he was a man of a fierce spirit both sodaine & bold, of no euill disposition sauing that he thought scantnesse of estate too great an euill. All these were the same night sent to the tower except Palmer, Arundell, and Vant, who were kept in the court well guarded in chambers apart. The day following the Dutches of Somerset was sent to the Tower, no man grieuing thereat because her pride and basenesse of life ouerballanced all pittie, and doubtlesse if any mischiefe were then contriued, whereof many were doubtfull (euery one giuing forth as he belieued) it was first hammered in the forge of her wicked working braine, for shee had alwaies wicked instruments about her, whom the more she found appliable to her purposes, the more fauours she bestowed vpon them, who being engaged by her into dangers held it dangerous to fall from her, also with her were committed one Crane and his wife, and her own chamberwoman. After these followed S^r Thomas Holdcroft, S^r Miles Partridge, Sir Michaell Stanhope, Wingfield, Banister, Vaughan, and some others. In diuers of these was then neither any cause knowne or afterwarde discovered, but the number raised the greater terror, and doubled the conceit of the danger.

Sir Thomas Palmer being againe examined added to his former deteccion, that the Gendarmorie vpon the muster day should be assaulted by 2000 foote vnder Sir Ralph Vane, and by 100 horses of the Duke of Somersets, besides his friends which should stand by, and besides the idle people which were thought inclineable to take his part, that this done he would runne throw the cittie and proclaime liberty, and in case his attempt did not succeed hee would goe to the Ile of Wight or to Poole.

Crane confessed for the most part as Palmer had done and futher added that the Lord Pagets house was the place, where the nobility being inuited to a banquet should haue lost their heads, and that the Earle of Arundell was made acquainted with the practise by S^t Michaell Stanhope, and that it had bin done but that the greatnesse of the enterprise caused delaies and sometimes diuersity of aduice, and further said that the Duke of Somerset once faining himselfe to be sieke, went to London to assay what friends he could procure. This Crane was a man who hauing consumed his owne estate had armed himselfe to any mischiefe.

Hamonde confessed that the Duke of Somersets chamber had beene strongly watched at Greenwich by night.

All these were sworne before the counsaile, and the greatest part of the nobility of the reahme, that their confessions were true. and as fauourably set downe in behalfe of the Duke, as with a safe conscience they could, and forthwith vpon the information of Crane the Earle of Arundell and the Lord Paget were sent to the Tower, so were Stradley, and S^t Albones seruants to the Earle of Arundell, the Lord Strange voluntarily enformed, how the Duke desired him to moue the King to take to wife his third daughter the Ladie Iane, and that he would be his especial about the King to aduertise him, when any of the counsaile spake priuately with him, and to acquaint him what they said.

Herevpon to giue some publique satisfaction to the people, the Lord Chancellor who had words at will & wit enough to apply them, declared openly in the starre chamber all these accusations against the Duke of Somerset, letters were also published to all Emperors, Kings, Embassadors, & chiefe men in any state, wherein these matters were comprehended. By other letters the muster of the Gendarmorie was deferred for certaine moneths, other letters were directed to Sir Arthur Darcy to take charge of the tower, and to discharge Sir Arthur Markham. For that without acquainting ing any of the Lords of the counsaile, he suffered the Duke of Somerset to walke abroad and permit entercourses of letters betweene David Seymor and Mrs Poynes.

Whilest these matters were in trauerse, messengers arriued from Duke Maurice of Saxony, the Duke of Mickleburge, and Iohn Marques of Brandenburge, Princes of the religion in Germanie, to vnderstand the Kings minde whether he would agree to aide them with 400000 dollars in case any necessity should assaile them, they consenting to doe the like to him in case he should be ouercharged with warre, the King gaue them an vncertaine answer, but gentle and full of faire hopes, that because their message was only to know the Kings inclination, and not to conclude he could giue them no other answer then this, that he was well enclined to ioyne in amity with them whom he knew to agree with him in religion, but first he was desirous to know whether they could procure such aide from other Princes as might enable them to maintaine their warres, and to assist him if need should require, and therefore he willed them to breake this matter to the Duke of Prussia and other Princes about them, and to procure the good will of Hamborough, Lubecke, and Breme, then he desired that the matter of religion should be plainly set downe, least vnder pretence thereof warres should be made for other quarrells, lastly he willed that they should furnish themselues with more ample instructions from their Lords to commune and conclude of all circumstances pertaining to that businesse.

The Kings answer was framed with these vncertainties and delaies, least if the King had assured his consent at the first, it might haue beene taken as breach of league with the Emperor, afterwards they and other Princes of Germany made a league offensive and defensive with the French King against the Emperor, into the which the French King desired the King of England to come, but because the French K. was the chiefe of the league, the king did plainly perceiue that the warre was not for the cause of religion, wherefore he answered that he could not doe it with breach of his league with the Emperor, against whom hauing no pretence of hostility, he was not so desirous of warres as without iust cause of his owne to pull them vpon him.

About the same time the Lord admirall was sent into France as the kings deputie to be Godfather at the baptisme of the French kings sonne, also a French man who had committed a murther at Diepe, and fled into England was remitted into France, and deliuered vpon the borders to receiue iustice by the same lawes against which he had offended.

And now the Duke of Northumberland being impatient of long working wickednesse, the 4th act of the Duke of Somersetts tragedie must not be delaied, least thereby feare abating, (as being false it could not be durable) either the kings gentle disposition, or the loue which he had formerly borne to his vnkle might happily returne to their naturall working. So the Duke of Somerset after a short abroad in the tower was brought to his triall at Westminster. The Lord William Paules Marques of Winchester and Lord treasurer sate as high Steward of England, vnder a cloath of estate on a bench moued three degrees, the Peeres to the number of 27 sate on a bench one step lower. These were the Duke of Suffolke and of Northumberland, the Marques of Northampton, the Earles of Darby, Bedforde, Huntington, Rusland, Bath, Sussex, Worcester, Pembroke, and Hereforde. The Barons, Abergauenny, Andely, Wharton, Euers, Latimer, Borough, Louch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcie, Sturton, Windefore, Cromwell, Cobham, and Bray.

First the inditements were read in number 5 containing a charge of raising men in the north parts of the realme, &c at his house, of assembling men to kill the Duke of Northumberland, of resisting his attachment, of killing the Gendarmorie, of raising London, of assaulting the Lords, and deuising their deaths, when the prisoner had pleaded not guilty and put himselfe vpon triall of his Peeres, the examinations before mentioned were read, and by the King learned counsaile pressed against him. Hereto albe it he was both vnskillfull and much appalled (causes sufficient to driue him out of matters) yet after a short entreaty, that words either idly or angerly spoken might not be enforced to any high crew, to the points objected he answered.

That he neuer intended to raise the north parts of the realme, but vpon some brutes he apprehended a feare, which moued him to send to Sr William Herbert to remaine his friend. That he determined not to kill the Duke of Northumberland or any other Lord, but spake of it only and determined the contrary. That it had beene a mad enterprife with his 100 men to assaile the Gendarmory consisting of 900, when in case he had preuailed, it would nothing haue auailed the pretended purpose, and therefore this being senselesse and absurd, must needs discredid other matters, which otherwise might haue beene belieued. That at London he neuer projected any stirre but euer held it a good place for his surety. That for hauing men in his chamber at Greenwich it was manifest he meant no harme, because when he might haue done it he did not, and further against the persons of them, whose examinations had beene read against him he objected many things, desiring they might be brought to his face, which in regard he was a person of dignity and estate he claimed to be reasonable, especially against Sr Thomas Palmer he spake much euill, and yet in opinion of many farre short of the truth. Hereto no answere was made but that the worse they were, the fitter they were to be his instruments, fit instruments indeed (said he) but rather for others then for me.

The fast being made the Kings learned counsaile auouched the law to be to assemble men with intent to kill the Duke of Northumberland was treason, by a statute of the 3 & 4th, or K. Edward then raigning, made against vnlawfull assemblies, that to raise London or the North parts of the realme was treason, that to minde resisting his attachment was felony, that to assault the Lords, and to devise their deaths was felony. But vnder fauour of their iudgement the statute alleaged bears no such sense, either for treason or for felony, indeed by a statute of K. Henry 7 it is felony for inferior persons to contriue the death of a Lord of the counsaile, but Lordes are therein expressly excepted.

The Lordes went together and first the Duke of Suffolke nobly said that he held it not reasonable; that this being but a contention betweene priuate subiects, vnder pretention thereof, any meane action should be drawen to intention of treason. The Duke of Northumberland (in countenance bearing shew of sadnesse but in truth stiffly obstinate) denyed that he would euer consent that any practise against him should be either imputed or reputed to be treason, yet this was not taken to proceede from modesty as he expected, but for that he could not with his honour or with reason so enforce it.

The Marques of Northampton was crossed and contentious with many, but neuer replied to any answere a manifest marke of no strong spirit. Some of the rest plainly brake forth that they held it vnfit that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marques of Northampton, and the Earle of Pembroke should be of the triall, because the prisoner was chiefly charged with practises intended against them. But hereto answere was made that a Peere of the Realme might not be challenged. After much variation of opinions the prisoner at the barre was acquit of treason, but by most voices (most fauouring the Duke of Northumberland) he was found guilty of felony. Hereupon iudgement followed that he should be hanged, but this would neuer haue gone so hard, had they not prosecuted all vnder pretence of treason.

The Duke of Somerset might haue craued his clerge, but he suffered iudgement to passe, thanked the Lords for his gentle triall, craued pardon of the Duke of Northumberland, the Marques of Northampton, and the Earle of Pembroke, for his ill meaning against them, and made suit for his life, in pittie to his wife, children, and seruants, and in regard of payment of his debts. As he departed because he was acquit of treason, the axe of the tower was not openly carried, whereupon the people supposing that he was altogether acquit, shooed halfe a dozed times so loud that they were heard beyond Charing Crosse. It is certaine the people fauoured him the more because they saw that there was much secret hate borne against him. But as this immoderate fauour of the multitude did him no good, so will it vndoe so many as shall trust vnto it. It was told the King that after the Dukes returne to the tower, he acknowledged to certaine Lords, that he had hired Bartuile to make them away, that Bartuile confessed so much, and that Hammond was not ignorant thereof, which whether it were true, or whether deuised to make the King more estranged from him, of iudgement could not hold themselves assured.

About this time Cuthbert Tonstall Bishop of Durham a man famous in those times for learning, and integrity of life, was sent to the tower for concealement of (I know not what) treason, written to him I know not by whom, and not discouered vntill (what shall I call) the party did reueale it. But the Lord Chancellor Rich hauing built a faire estate, and perceiuing what nimble ears were borne to listen after treason, also for that a parliament was towards wherein he was doubtfull what questions might arise, made suit to the King that in regard of the infirmities of his body, he might be discharged of his office, giuing good example to men sometimes by their owne moderation to auoid disgrace. So he deliuered the seale at his house in great S^t Bartholomewes to the Duke of Northumberland &c.

the Earle of Pembroke sent by the King with commission to receiue it. The same seale was forthwith deliuered to Dr Godricke Bishop of Ely, a man if happily able to discharge the place, assuredly no more. It was first deliuered vnto him only during the sicknesse of the Lord Rich, but in short time after he was sworne Lord Chancellor, because as keeper of the seale he could not then execute such matters as were to be dispatched in parliament.

And now after iudgement against Somerſet the Lords were not negligent to entertaine the King with all delights they could deuise, partly to winne his fauour, but especially to conuert his thoughts from his condemned Vnkle, to this end they often presented him with stately masques, braue challenges at title and at barriers, and whatſoeuer exercises or disports they could coniecture to be best pleasing to him, then also he first began to keepe hall, and the Christmas time was passed ouer with banquetings, masques, plaies, and much other variety of mirth. Often they would call him to serious affaires wherein he tooke especiall pleasure. Sometimes they would remember him how dangerous the Duke of Samerſet was, who hauing made away his only brother, contriued the death of the chiefe of the nobility. And where (say they) would his mischief haue rested? Would it haue raged against all and left the King only vntouched? Verily hauing beene alwaies both cruell and false, there would haue beene no end of his mischief, and all his submissions must now be taken for counterfeit and dissembled. But his avarice and ambition once remqued, the way will be laid open to vertue and merit.

— So about two moneths after his iudgement the 5th and last act of his tragedie was brought vpon the stage. When being so often exposed to fortunes mercy before he was placed by a strong guard vpon a scaffold at tower hill, about eight of the clocke in the morning to suffer death, & albeit straight charge had beene giuen the day before to euery

houfholder in the citty, not to permit any to depart out of their houfes before ten of the clocke that day, yet the people the more vnruely by this reſtraint, by ſuch thick throngs ſwarmed to the place, that before ſeauen of the clocke the hill was couered and all the chambers which opened towards the ſcaffold were taken vp.

Here the Duke firſt aduowed to the people, that his intentions had beene not only harmeleſſe in regard of particular perſons, but driuing to the common benefit both of the King and of the Realme. Then he exhorted them vnto obedience, aſſuring them that no perſons could juſtly auouch their faith to God, who were not faithfull to their King.

But herewith behold certaine perſons of a hamlet neere who had beene warned by the Licutenant of the tower to attend that morning about ſeauen of the clocke, coming after their hower through the poſterne, and perceiving the priſoner to be mounted vpon the ſcaffold, began to runne and to call to their fellowes to come away. The ſodaine of their coming, the haſt that they made, the weapons they carried, but eſpecially the word, come away, being often doubled, moued many of the neereſt to ſuſmiſe that a power was come to receiue the Duke, whereupon many cried with a high voice. Away, Away, the cry of thoſe and the coming on of the other caſt, amazement vpon the reſt, ſo much the more terrible becauſe no man knew what he feared or wherefore, euery man conceiuing that which his aſtoniſhed fancie did caſt in his minde, ſome imagined that it thundred, others that it was an earthquake, others that the powder in the armorie had taken fire, others that troopes of horſemen approached. In which medly of conceits they bare downe one another, and iſtled many into the tower ditch, and long it was before the vaine tumult could be appeaſed.

No ſooner was the people ſetled in quiet, and the Duke beginning to finiſh his ſpeech, but vpon another idle apprehension they fell to be no lesse riotous in ioy then they had beene in feare. For Sr Anthony Browne coming on horiebacke vpon the spurre gaue occasion, whereby many entertained hope that he brought a pardon, whereupon a great shout was raised, A pardon, A pardon, God saue the King. But the Duke expressed great constancy at both these times, often desiring the people to remaine quiet that he might quietly end his life. For said he I haue often looked death in the face vpon great aduentures in the field, he is now no stranger to me, and among all the vaine mockeries of this world I repent me of nothing more then in esteeming life more deare then I should. I haue endured the hate of great persons, so much the more dangerous because vniust. I haue incurred displeasure from inferiors, not alwaies for any great faults of mine owne, (albeit I was neuer free) but for giuing way to the faults of others, and now being constantly relooked, I neither feare to dy nor desire to liue, and hauing mastered all grieve in my selfe, I desire no man to sorrow for me, so hauing testified his faith to God, and his faithfulnessse to the King, he yeelded his body into the executioners hand, who with one stroake of the axe cut off all his confused cogitations and cares, the more pitied by the people for the knowne hate of Northumberland against him.

Assuredly he was a man harmelesse and faithfull, and one who neuer hatched any hopes preiudiciall to the King, but alwaies intended his safety and honour, but hard it is for greatnesse to stand when it is not sustained by the proper strength. The people whose property it is by excessiue fauour to bring great men to miserie, and then to be excessiue in pitty departed away grieved and afraid, and yet feared to seeme to be afraid, and for this cause chiefly did neuer beare good minde to Northumberland afterwards although in shew they dissemble the contrary, for nothing is more easie then to discern when people obserue great men from the heart, or when they doe it for fashion or for feare, and as it often happeneth that men oppressed worke reuenge after their deaths. So the remembrance of Somerſet much moued the people to fall from Northumberland in his greateſt attempt, and to leaue him to his fatall fall, whereat they openly reioyced and preſented to him handkerchiefes dipped in the blood of Somerſet, for whom they thought he deſerued rather late then vnderſerued puniſhment. So certaine it is that the debts both of cruelty and mercy goe neuer vnpaid, I omit the meane ſcourges of conſcience. For assuredly a body cannot be ſo torne with ſtripes, as a minde is with remembrance of wicked actions, but of him more hereafter ſhall be ſaid, and how his greatneſſe turned to be fortunes ſcorne.

But outwardly and for the preſent he gained a great hand ouer the nobility, who ſoone obſeruing that he was able to endanger the eſtate of the greateſt, & that the more reſpect they did beare to him, the more ſafely they liued & the more eaſily aduanced to honour, they all contended to creepe into his humor, to watch his wordes, his geſtures, his lookes, & to doe that as of them ſelues which they conceiued he had a deſire they ſhould doe.

But the king albe it at the firſt he gaue no token of any ill tempered paſſion as taking it not agreeable to maiesty, openly to declare himſelfe, and albe it the Lords did much helpe to diſpell any dampie thoughts which the remembrance of his vnkle might raiſe, by applying him with great variety of exerciſes and diſportes, yet vpon ſpeech of him afterwards he would often ſigh and let fall teares, ſometimes he was of opinion that he had done nothing that deſerued death, or if he had, that it was very ſmall, and proceeded rather from his wiſe then from himſelfe. And where then ſaid he was the good nature of a nephew? where was the clemency of a Prince? Ah how vnfortunate haue I beene to thoſe of my blood? My mother I ſlew at my very birth, and ſince haue made away two other brothers.

thers, and happily to make away for the purposes of others against my selfe. Was it euer knowen before that a Kinges vnkle, a Lord Protector, one whose fortunes had much aduanced the honour of the realme, did loose his head for felony, for a felony neither cleere in law and in fact weakly proued? A lasse how falsely haue I beene abused? How weakly caried? How little was I master ouer my owne iudgement? That both his death and the enuy thereof must be charged vpon mee?

Not long after the death of Somerset, because it was not thought fit that such a person should be executed alone, who could hardly be thought to offend alone. S^r Ralph Vane and S^r Miles Partridge were hanged on tower hill, S^r Michaell Stanhope, and S^r Thomas Arundell were there also beheaded. All these tooke it vpon their last charge that they neuer offended against the King, nor against any of his counsaile, God knowes whether obstinately secret, or whether innocent, and in the opinion of all men Somerset was much cleered by the death of those who were executed to make him appeare faulty.

S^r Ralph Vane was charged with conspiring with Somerset, but his bold answeres termed rude and ruffianlike, falling into yeares apt to take offence, either only caused or much furthered his condemnation. For besides his naturall fiercenesse enflamed by his present disgrace, he was the more free by reason of his great seruices in the field. The time hath beene, said he, when I was of some esteeme, but now we are in peace which reputeth the coward and courageous alike, and so with an obstinate resolution he made choice rather not to regard death then by any submission to entreat for life, indeed it was well knowne that he had beene famous for seruice, but therewith it was well knownen by whose fauour he had beene famous.

S^r Thomas Arundell was with some difficulty condemned, for his cause was brought to triall about seauen of the clocke in the morning, about noone the Iurors went together and because they could not agree, they were shut in a house all the residue of that day, and all the night following, the next morning they found him guilty, unhappy man, who found the doing of any thing or of nothing dangerous alike.

Sr Miles Partridge, and Sr Michaell Stanhope were condemned as confociates in the conspiracy of Somerset. Both reputed indifferently disposed to bad or good, yet neither of them of that temper as to dare any dangerous fact: either because they were so indeed, or because their fauour or alliance with the dutchesse of Somerset made them to be of lesse esteeme.

Garter K. at armes was sent to the Lord Paget prisoner in the tower to take from him the garter and the George, and to discharge him of that order. The pretence of this dishonour was because he was said to be no gentleman of blood, neither by Father nor by Mother. The Garter and the George were forthwith bestowed vpon the Earle of Warwicke, eldest sonne to the Duke of Northumberland. about this time the order was almost wholly altered, as by the statutes thereof then made it appeares.

After these times few matters of high nature or observable note happened in England during King Edwards life. Of these I will sele& such as I esteeme most fit for history, both as being publique, and as contained matter of some regard, not alwaies obseruing the iust order of time, but sometime coherence or propinquity of matter.

Sr Philip Hobby was sent to pay 62000 pounds at Antwerp, for payment of which summe the King stood to diuers persons engaged. This done he went to the Regent, then lying at Brussels to declare vnto her certaine grieuances of the English merchants aduentures, but he receiued nothing but faire promises which proued deceiuable. Afterwards Monsier de Couriers came from the Regent to the King to vnderstand more particularly the complaints of the Merchants, and therewith to desire that her subjects ships might might safely take harbour in any of the Kings hauens. For the first a note of the merchants complaints was deliuered in writing, but answere was deferred for want of instructions, an vsuall pretence in like affaires. Touching the second, answere was made, that the King had giuen order that Flemmish shippes should not be molested in any of his hauens, which appeared in that they were there alwaies rescued from the pursuit and chase of the French. But hee thought it not fit that more should enter his hauens at once then he had power to gouerne. Assuredly the Merchant aduenturers haue beene often wronged and wringed to the quicke, but were neuer quicke and liuely in thanks to those by whose endeauours they were freed.

The same merchants exhibited a bill at the counsaile table against the Merchants of the Stilliard. After answere by those of the Stilliard, and reply by the aduenturers, it was conceiued vpon view of diuers Charters, that the Merchants of the Stilliard were no sufficient corporation, and that their number, names, and nation could not be knowne. Also that when they had forfeited their liberties, King Edward the fourth restored them vpon condition, that they should couer no strangers goods which they had not obserued. And againe whereas at the beginning they shipped not aboue 80 cloathes after that 100, afterwards 1000, after that 6000, at that time 44000 cloathes were shipped euery yeare in their names, and not aboue 1100 by all strangers besides, wherefore albeit certaine Embassadors from Hamborough & Lubeck spake much in their behalfe, yet a decree was made, that they had forfeited their liberties, & were in the same condition with other strangers. And albeit they made great moanes afterwards, yet could they not procure this sentence to be reuerfed.

A commission was granted to viii Bishops, viii other Diuines, viii Ciuitians, and viii common Lawyers, and in all xxxii to set forth ecclesiasticall lawes, agreeable to the nature both of the people and of the religion then established in in the Church of England, but it tooke no effect. For neither the number of the commissioners being many, nor the quality of them being persons both in great offices and diuers farre remote could afford meetings for so great a businesse. Also the difference both of portessions & of ends, did of necessity raise much difference in iudgment.

The King had sixe Chaplaines in Ordinary, touching whose attendance in court an order was made, that two should remaine with the King by turnes, and fower should trauaile in preaching abroad. The first yeare two in Wales, and two in Lincolneshire, the next yeare two in the Marshes of Scotland and two in Torkeshire. The third yeare two in Denonshire, & two in Hampshire. The fourth yeare two in Northfolke, and Essex, and two in Kent & Sussex, & so throw all the shires in England, which happily did not only serue for a spirituall end, namely instruction in religion, but did also aduance a temporall purpose of peaceable obedience. For as rude vntrained mindes are not only easily drawn but inclineable of themselues to sedition and tumult, so by learning and religion men are especially both reduced and retained in ciuill quiet.

For better dispatch of businesse of diuers natures, the body of the counsaile was diuided into seuerall commissions. Some were appointed for hearing those suits which were vsually brought before the whole table, to send matters of iustice to their proper courts, to giue full deniall to such as they should not esteeme reasonable, to certify what they thought meet to be granted, and vpon allowance thereof to dispatch the parties. Others were appointed to consider of penall lawes and proclamations in force and to quicken the execution of the most principall. These were directed first to consider what principall lawes and proclamations were most needfull to be executed. Then to enquire into the countries how they were disobeyed and first to punish greatest offenders, and afterwards to proceede to the rest. Lastly that they should enquire what other disorders were either dangerous or offensive in euery shire, and either to punish the offenders or else to report their iudgement therein. Others were appointed to attend occurrences of state at large, with whom the King did sit once euery weeke to heare matters of greatest moment debated, because in these high passages nothing was thought to be done truly with maiesty, nothing agreeable to the dignity of the state, but in the presence of the King. Generally all the counsaile agreed that none of them should make suit to the King for land or forfeitures aboue xx^l or for reuersion of leases, or any other extraordinary matter vntill the state of his Reuenewes should be further known.

Besides these commissions another went forth to ouersee and order the Kinges reuenewes, and to cut off superfluous charges, to ouersee all courts, especially those of new erection, as the court of augmentation, and of first fruits and tenths, and to prouide that the reuenewes were answered euery halfe yeare, another went forth for debts owing to the King, and to take accompt of payments since the 35 of K. Henry the 8th, and in what manner the King had beene deceiued, either by not accounting or accounting falsely. Another also for taking away needlesse Boulwarkes, by vertue whereof, diuerie were dinolished vpon the sea coasts, in peace chargeable and little seruiceable in warre. And further for more orderly and speedy dispatch of causes, the King deliuered to his counsaile these Articles following.

1 That all suits petitions and common warrants deliuered to the priny counsell be considered by them on mundaies in the afternoone and answered on saturdayes in the afternoone, and that those daies and no other be assigned to that purpos.

2 That such suits and petitions as pertaine to any courts of law, be referred to those courts where properly they are triable, others to be determined with expedition.

3 That in making warrants for money it be forseene, that they

they be not for such matters as may be dispatched by warrants dormant, least by such meanes accompts should be uncertaine.

4 That upon Sundaies they intend publique affaires of the Realme, dispatch answers to letters for good order of the State, and make full dispatches of all things concluded the weeke before. Provided that they be present at common praier.

5 That on Sunday night the Secretaries or one of them deliver to the King a memoriall of such things as are to be debated by the priny counsaile, and he to appoint certaine of them to be debated upon severall daies, viz. Munday afternoone. Tuesday, wensday, Thursday, and Friday beforenoone.

6 That on friday afternoone they shall make a collection of such things as have beene done the fower daies before, what they have concluded and what the time suffered not to peruse. Also the principall reasons which moved them to conclude of such matters as seemed doubtfull.

7 That on Saturday before noone they present this collection of the King and enquire his pleasure upon all things which they have concluded, and also upon all private suits.

8 That none of the priny counsell depart the court for longer time then two daies, unlesse eight of the counsell remaine behind, and unlesse the King have notice thereof.

9 That they make no assembly in counsell unlesse they be to the number of foure at the least.

10 That if they assemble to the number of fower, and under the number of sixe, then they may reason or examine the commodities or inconueniencas of matters proposed, and make things plaine which seeme diffused at the first opening, and if they agree then at the next full assembly of sixe, a perfect conclusion thereof shall be made.

11 That if there be under fower and a matter arriseth requiring expedition, they shall declare it to the King, but not give answer unlesse it requires extraordinary hast.

12 That if such matters shall arise as it shall please the King to heare the same debated, warning shall be given that the more may be present.

13 That if such matter arise as cannot be ended without long debating, the counsaile shall not intermeddle with other causes untill they haue concluded the same.

14 That no priuate suit be entermedled with great affaires, but shall be heard on Mandies only.

15 That when matters for scantnesse of time be only discussed and not brought to an end; then it shall be noted to what point the businesse is brought, and what haue beene the principall reasons, that when it shall be treated againe it may the sooner come to conclusion.

16 That in tedious or difficult matters two or three or more may be appointed to prepare and report the same; that being lesse cumbrons and defuse they may the more easily be dispatched.

17 That no warrant for reward aboue 40^l, or businesse, or affaires aboue 100^l passe but under the Kings signet.

18 That if upon aduertisements or other occasions matters of great importance appeare which require hast, such matters shall be considered and determined, notwithstanding those Articles which appoint businesse for seuerall daies, so as this order be not generally or commonly broken.

Assuredly albeit the King declared both his iudgment and his diligence and care of affaires of the realme. Yet is there one rule more (and not by him neglected) for all great officers, which if it be not sufficient in it selfe to hold matters in order, yet are no rules sufficient without it.

And this is to choose persons both for ability and integrity well reputed, albeit happily they be not alwaies vsed. For besides that these will be a rule to themselues, it is a great satisfaction to the people, and keepeth them both from murmuring and curious enquiring into counsailes of State, which is neuer good and often dangerous when they know or at least suppose matters to passe vnder such mens iudgements,

In these times it was conceiued by many that by erecting recting of a Mart in England, the realme would be much enriched and made more famous, and lesse obnoxious to other countries. The time was then esteemed fit by reason of the warres betweene the Emperor and the French King. The places deemed most meete were Hull for the east countries, and Southampton for the South. London was thought no ill place, but Southampton was iudged most conuenient for the first beginning. This matter detained the Lords of the counsell in a deliberation both serious and long, with great strength and variety of reasons on both sides, which because they may giue some light to the like question, which in times ensuing may happily againe be set on foot. I will here declare them in the same manner as they were collected by the King.

Against the Mart these objections were made.

1 That Strangers could haue no accesse into England by land, which they had at Antwerp where the Mart then was.

2 That the ill working of English cloaths made them lesse esteemed abroad.

3 That the great quantity of English cloathes in Flanders would make them lesse desired from hence.

4 That the Merchants had then established their dwelling places at Antwerp.

5 That other Nations would forbear their resort into England for a while upon commandement of the Emperor.

6 That the deniall of the requests of the Merchants of the Stilliard would be a hindrance to the Mart if preuention were not used.

7 That the poverty and smalnesse of Southampton would be a great impediment.

8 That the Riuer Rhene was more commodious for Antwerp then any riuer was for England.

1 Herevnto answere was made that at the time when the Mart should beginne at Southampton, the French King and the Almans would stop entercourse to Antwerp by land, so as nothing should passe that way but in great danger. Againe as Southampton wanteth the commodity of accessse of merchandise by land, so it hath the commodity that there can be no accessse of enimies by land, and if warres should be raised then the Naue of England is sufficient to defend them. And further that trafique that cometh to Antwerp by land is almost only from the Venetians, who may with greater ease, and lesse danger transport their merchandises into England by sea. That the ill making of cloathes was fit to be redressed by the Parliament, then sitting, and the matter was then reduced to some ripenesse, the vpper house hauing one bill and the neither house another in good forwardnesse. Neither were they so ill made but that the Flemmings did easily desire them, offering rather to Pay the imposition of the Emperor then to be without them.

That it were necessarie that the passage of ships should be staied vntill the Mart should aduance to some ripenesse, and that cloathes should be bought with the Kinges money and conueied to Southampton to be there vttered at the Mart, which should helpe the inconuenience very well. That merchants neuer binde themselues to any mansion, which either to archieue gaine or to auoide danger they will not readily forsake, for so they remoued from Bruges to Antwerp only for the English commodities. And therefore seeing they shall haue a good commodity by coming to Southampton, and be rid of great feare of danger both in their liues and goods, in forsaking Antwerp, there is little feare that they will be curious in making the change.

That the Emperor was then so neerely driuen, that neither was he willing to attend the impeachment of the Mart, neither could he at that time doe it, for the Flemmings and the Spaniards vnder him could more hardly be without the English, then the English without them, and therefore would hardly be brought to forbear that trafique, and besides they liued then in feare of loosing all.

That

That it were good that for the present the Stilliard men were generally answered, and triall made whether by any gentle offer of some part of their liberties they might be brought to ship, and their wares vnto the mart. The French also might easily be drawn ouer, hauing one trafique at that time but with England. That these two might suffice to beginne a Mart.

That the merchants would make good shift for their lodging, and it is not the ability of the place that maketh a mart, but the resort of Merchants, as Spaniards, Almans, Italians, Flemmings, Venetians, Danes, in exchanging their commodities one with another. With whom also would concurre the Merchants of London, Bristowe, and other places of England, and some of the cloaths which should be carried thither at the first might be taken vp with the Kings money and there be vttered.

That Bruges where the Mart was before standeth not vpon the Rheene neither doth Antwerp where the Mart was then. Frankeford doth and may well serue for a faire for high Almaine, but Southampton serueth better for all countries vpon the sea, for few of these resort to Frankeford.

Herewith diuerse reasons were alleaged for the Mart, and namely that the vent of English cloathes would hereby be open in all times of warre, that the English merchants goods would be out of danger of strangers, and without feare of danger of arresting vpon euery light cause. That it would much enrich the Realme, because as a Market enricheth a towne, so doth a Mart enrich a Kingdome. That vpon occasion great summes of money might be borrowed of them who frequent the Mart. That the King might command a great number of strangers ships to serue in his warres. That warre being made all goods should be in the Kings danger. that the English should buy all things at the first hand of strangers. Whereas then the strangers sold their wares to the Flemings, & the Flemings to the English. That the townes towards the sea would hereby be made more populous, rich, beautifull and strong. That the merchants instead of Tapistries, points, glasses and other laces, would then bring in bullion, and other substantiall merchandizes to haue the English cloath, and tinne That by this means the English should abate the power of their enimies, and not be enforced to borrow of Merchants but when they list, and that in no great quantity or summe.

The time was then esteemed most conuenient, because the warres betwixt the French and the Emperor caused the Italians, Genowaies, Portugals, and Spaniards to forbear their trade to Antwerp. The Prussians also and other East countries hauing 14 ships against the Emperor would not be very forward to aduenture thither. Again the French inuading Lorraine, and menacing Flanders, and the Almaines lying on the riuer of Rbeere, did stop the course of merchants out of Italie, as well to Frankford as to Antwerp. And further the putting of souldiers into Antwerp moued the Merchants to forbear their trafique, and to looke to their safety. Also the breach which a late tempest had made, was like to make the channell vncertaine, and the hauen naught. Lastly the stop of the exchange to Lyons would make many Flemmings bankrupts. And because these nations cannot liue without a vent. These things decaying the Mart of Antwerp & Frankford they would most willingly vpon erecting a free Mart resort to England.

And here the towne of Southampton was esteemed most fit because the Spaniards, Brittaines, Gascoins, Lombards, Genowaies, Normans, Italians, the Merchants of the Eastland, the Prussians, Danes, Swedens & Norwegians might indifferently resort thither, & more easie than to Antwerpe. And wheras the Flemmings hauing few commodities haue allured Merchants by their priuiledges to settle a Mart among them, much more easily should the English doe it hauing both oppurtunity & meanes, as cloath, tinne, seacoale lead, bellmettall and such other commodities, as few christian rian countries haue the like.

Lastly the meanes to establish this mart were contriued to be these. First that the English merchants should forbear their resort for a mart or two beyond the seas vnder pretence of the impositions there charged vpon them. Then that proclamation should be made in diuerse parts of this Realme where Merchants chiefly resort, that there shalbe a free Mart kept at Southampton to beginne presently after whitson tide and to continue fise weekes, so as it should be noe hindrance to St James faire at Briston nor to Bartholomew faire in London. The priuiledges of which Mart should be expressed to be these.

That all men should haue free libertie for resort and returne without arresting, except in cases of treason, murther or felony. That for the time of the Mart all men should pay but halfe the custome due in other places of the Realme. That during the time noe shipping should be made from any place betweene Southmales & Essex but only to Southampton. That in Hampshire, Wilshire, Sussex, Surry, Kent, Dorsetshire, and no bargaine should be made for wares during that time but only at that Mart. That a court should be erected to punish offenders with liberties of good condition. That some one commodity as happily some one kind of cloath should be assigned as proper to the Mart. That some liberties must be giuen to the inhabitants of Southampton and some monies lent to them if it might be spared to beginne their Trafique. That ships should attend the safegard of Merchants so well as they could, and that if this Mart tooke good effect, another might be erected at Hull for the Northeast countries, to beginne presently after Sturbridge faire, so as they might returne before the great Ices stopped their seas.

Thus it was concluded but the execution was for a time delaied because the wooll fleete of 60 saile, was lately before departed for Antwerp, & could not possibly be called backe. But to make the first preparation because a Mart could not subsist without exchange; liberty was granted to the English Merchants, to exchange and rechange money for money. As vpon this occasion this profitable purpose was first delaied, so afterwards it was altogether dashed, first by the Kinges sicknesse, after by his death.

Now albeit the King was both deeply in debt, and had many extraordinary occasions, yet in regard of the trouble some times he did forbear to charge his subiects with such loanes and impositions as vsually in peace breed discontent, and in turbulent times disquiet, but he chose rather to deale with the Foulker in the low Countries for monneys vpon loane at a very high rate. And hereupon letters were directed from the Lords of the counsell to the Foulker at Antwerp that he had receiued from the King 63000 pounds Flemmish in Februarie, and 24000 in Aprill next before, which amounted to 87000 pounds Flemmish. A faire summe to be paid in one year, especially in that busy world when it was necessarie for Princes not to be without money. Hereupon and for that they vnderstood that at that time he was well able to forbear money, they aduised the King to pay to him only 5000 pounds of the 45000^l which then remained vnpaid, and to continue the rest at the vsuall yearly interest of 14^l for euery hundred, where-with they desired him to retaine good patience. Hereto the Foulker answered that as he had found faire dealings before, so he would rest content to deferre payment of 30000^l so as 20000^l thereof might be well assured to be paid within some conuenient time. All this was presently agreed, and no lesse faithfully performed afterwards. And assuredly as God is the word and cannot but make good his word, so a Prince so much looseth of his dignity as hee declineth from his word.

About this time a garrison pay of 10000^l was sent to the Frontires of Scotland, and the like to Calais, and in the same yeere 5000^l into Ireland, hereto if we adde the Kings great charges in fortification vpon both the frontires of Scotland and France the particulars whereof I omit as matters now altogether of no use, it may easily be discerned that the hostility with Scotland and France and the incivility of Ireland were a great part of the cause which held this frugall King thus diued in debt.

And for another means of raising of mony commissions went forth for selling chantry lands, and houses for payment of the Kings debt giuen forth to be 251000 pounds sterling at the least. Also to enquire of all Church goods either remaining in Cathedrall or parish Churches or embesled away, & namely of Jewels of gold & siluer, or siluer crosses, candlesticks, censors, challicies, ready mony, coapes and other vestiments, and reseruing to euery Church one Challice, and couering for the Communion table, the residue to be applied to the benefit of the King. By their sales and enquiries the Kings wants were somewhat relieued. And many persons, uery meane both for birth and ability of minde, and of no lesse place of employment, found means to aduance themselues to so great estate as they left their posterity ranged among the nobility of this realme.

Of these church purchasers, I haue scene many melt to nothing, and the residue shall be obserued either by riot or by improvidence to consume.

At the same time for more assured strength of the Borders vpon Scotland order was setled that no man in those parts should beare two offices at once, which not well obserued in later years hath much derogated both from the dignity and discharge of offices aswell in state as in some interior places.

Another means for raising mony was practised no lesse pleasing to the people then profitable to the commonwealth. And that was by enquiring after offences of officers in great place, who as by vniust dealing they became most odious, so by iustice in their punishments, the Prince acquireth both loue and applause. And so one Beaumont Master of the Rolles was conuincied, that in his office of wardes he had purchased lands with the Kinges mony, also that he had lent about 700^l of the Kinges mony, and forborne 11000 of the Kinges debts for his owne profit. Also that being Mr of the Rolles he dealt corruptly in a case betwene the Duke of Suffolke, and the Lady Powes. For he bought the Ladies Tithe and caused an indenture to be forged from Charles Brandon the Duke a little before deceased, purposing a grant of the lands in question from Duke Charles to the Lady Powes. Also that he had concealed the felony of his seruant, who hauing stolne from him 200^l he tooke the mony to himselfe againe. Hereupon he surrendered to the King all his offices, lands & goods in satisfaction aswell for the monies due by him to the King, as of the fines which his offences had merited, he was a man of a dull and heauy spirit, and therefore the more senselessly deuoted in his sensuall auarice.

One Whalie receiuer of Yorkeeshire acknowledged how he had lent the Kinges mony for gaine, how he euer paid one yeares reuenue with the arrerages of the yeare before; how he had bought the Kinges land with the Kinges mony, how he had made diuerse false accompts, how vpon fall of mony he borrowed diuerse summes, whereby he gained 500^l at one crying downe. For these misdemeanors he surrendered his office, and submitted himselfe to pay such fines as the King or his counsell should charge vpon him.

The Lord Paget Chancellor of the Duchie was conuicted that he had sold the Kings landes and timber woods without commission, that he had taken great fines for the Kings lands and applied them to his proper vse, and that he had made leases in reuerſion for more then xxi years, for these offences he surrendered his office and submitted himselfe to be fined at the pleasure of the King. So his fine was geſſed at 6000^l whereof 2000 were remitted vpon condition that the other 4000 should be paid within the compass of that yeare.

This he endured with a manly patience as knowing

right well that he held all the residue of his estate vpon cur-resie of those who hated him at the heart. It was at the first suspected and afterwards expected by all that among other matters objected against the Lord Paget the chiefe or at least one should haue beene for contriuing to Bari-quet the Lords at his house, and vnder pretence thereof to take off their heads, which was the only cause for which the Duke of Somerset lost his head. But because no mention was made thereof, because about the same time the Lord Gray of Wilton, Bannister and Crane, and a little after the Earle of Hrudell were freely discharged hauing beene imprisoned for this conspiracy, the conceit was taken that the Dukes head was the only aime, and that the residue were vsed but as a countenance of state to dazle the people.

Letters were sent to the gouernor of Gernesey, that divine seruice should there be vsed according to the forme of the Church of England. A King of Armes named Vlster was newly instituted for Ireland, his prouince was all Ireland; and he was the first 4th King of Aarmes, the first herald appointed for Ireland.

Whilest these matters were in action the Emperors Em-bassador in England deliuered letters to the King from the Regent in the low Countries, importing that whereas the King was bound by a treaty betweene the Emperor and the Kinges Father at Lutrecht in the yeare 1542, that if the low Countries should be inuaded the King should aide him with 5000 foote, or 70 crownes a day during 4 moneths and that this aide should be performed within one moneth after request. For so much as the French King inuaded Luxembourg, the Emperor required aide of the King of England according to the effect of that treaty.

Herevpon order was giuen that if the Embassador did moue for answere to this letter, he should be told by two of the counsell, that during the Kinges progresse his counsell was disperfed, whose aduice he was desirous to heare.
And further that the K. had committed the same treaty to be perused by men whose iudgments as he did much respect, so would he expect a time vntill their opinions might be heard. And in case that after this the Embassador should againe require an answer, then they should say that the King hauing lately wrestled out of most dangerous warres, wherewith his yong years were ouerburthened, he hoped well that the Emperor would not desire to thrust him into the like againe. That he had sworne amity with the French King which he could not with his honour breake, & therefore if the Emperor should deeme it so meete he would mediate a peace as a friend to both, which he should best effect by forbearing to vse hostility against either. And in case the Embassador should still perseuere to vrge the treaty they were lastly directed to answer that the King did not hold himselfe bound by that treaty, as both made by his Father and euidently preiudiciall to his realme, for albeit agreements of peace are perpetuall & bind the successors, yet it is not so in agreements of society & cōfederation. And this the Emperor did right well vnderstand, for whē the King in his last warres desired to enter a new treaty with the Emperor, he returned answer that it should not need, for albeit the King were discharged by his Fathers death yet the Emperor was still bound. And againe the Emperor had not for his part performed the treaty, as well in hindring the carriage of horses, armor, and munition, which the King had prouided for his warres, as also in neglecting to send aide when the low Country of Calais was foraged, and therefore he did not iustly demand performance thereof from the King.

I know it hath beene often in like sort answered, that treaties dissolue by death of those who made them, for so the Fidenates held themselves discharged of the league which they had made with Romulus after his death. And the Latines did the like after the death of Tullus, and likewise after the death of Ancus. The Etrurians affirmed the like after the death of Priscus. And the Sabines after the death of Sernius. And againe after that Tarquinius was cast cast out of stat e. I know also that the difference is great betweene a league of peace and a league of iociety & confederation. But I will not touch euery string of this question, which Hottoman calleth a noble question, and much tossed and debated, partly because it consisteth of many knotty and thorny distinctions, wherein approued authors doe not well agree, but chiefly because at this time it fell not to be a difference betweene the Emperor and the King.

For when the Embassador first came for answere to this letter M^r Wotton and M^r Hobbie answered according to the first branch of their instructions, wherewith he departed well satisfied for the present, and before he called for answere againe one Stukely arriued out of France and declared to the counsell how the French King being persuaded that Stukely would neuer returns into England because he departed without leaue vpon apprehension of the Duke of Somerser, his master bewraied to him that if he could procure peace with the Emperor, he intended to besiege Calais and was in hope to carry the towne by way of the sand hills, and that from thence winning rice banke he might both famish the Towne, and beate the market place, how he further said that he intended to land in some angle of Scotland about Falmouth because boulevarkes there might easily be wonne, and the people were for the most part Catholiques. And further how at the same time Mounfier de Guise should enter England by the way of Scotland, not only with good leaue, but with aide and conduct from the Scots.

Vpon this discouery the King assembled his counsell at Windsor, & entred with them into deliberation, whether it were either safe from him or to no disaduantage to rely so securely either vpon the strength or faith of France, as either to refuse or neglect to afford aide vnto the Emperor, and thereby happily incurre his hostility.

Many were of opinion that the King should condescend to aide the Emperor. First for that if the King were desiroust to hold the Emperor bound by the treaty made with the Kings father he must also be obliged thereby. Otherwise it was a lame halting league and could not possibly goe vpright. Then for that if the Emperor should not be aided the house of Burgundie was like to be deuoured by the French, whereby their greatnesse might grow dreadfull especially to England. Then for that againe the French King had drawen the Turke into Christendome, and therefore was to be resisted as a common enemy. And further in case the Emperor vpon extremity should compose agreement with the French, the dangerto England would be double. First vpon offence taken by the Emperor, then vpon the French Kings old disposition edged by euey new displeasure wherein the deuotion of the Bishop of Rome would not be wanting. And againe the English Merchants were so ill intreated in the Empire, the Realme was so much engaged in honour and in wealth as some remedy was to be sought, & none better then by giuing aide. Lastly the French Kings proceedings were no lesse doubtfull then fearfull, not only in regard of Stukelies report (not altogether to be neglected) but by reason of his breaking and firing diuers English ships the auncient strength and fortresses of the realme.

Others were of aduice that the Emperors demands of aide should be denied. First for that it would be too chargeable and almost impossible for the English to performe. Then for that when the Emperor should die the whole weight of the warre would roule vpon the English. And further the Germane Protestants would be offended herewith, & conceiue some doubts of their owne estates. Lastly there was hope that the amity with France would not long continue but amend, & that the Embassadors then lately sent would repaire all harmes done by the French vpon English shippes.

Betweene both these the King stroke a midling iudgment, so to aide the Emperor against the French King as other Christian Princes should also adioine, and that for no other cause but as a common enemy for drawing the Turkes forces vpon them.

That hereby as the cause was common so would there be more parties to it. And this also would moderate the charge of aiding the Emperor according to the treaty, and whensoever the Emperor should die or breake off, it was likely that some of those Princes and parties should remaine so as the King should not stand alone. Moreover this friendship would much advance the Kinges other affaires in Germany, and finally it would be honourable to breake with the French King vpon this common quarrell.

Against this aduise of the King, two obiections were made, one that the treaty must be entertained with so many that it could not be speedily or secretly concluded. The other that in case the purpose should be discouered and not concluded the French might be prouoked thereby to practise the like confederation against the English.

All these the King did knit vp in this conclusion, first that the treaty should be made only with the Emperor, and by the Emperors means with other Princes. Secondly that the Emperors acceptance should be well vnderstood before any treaty were either entered or entertained against the French.

Herevpon letters were dispatched to Mr Morison the Kinges Embassador with the Emperor whereby he was directed to declare to the Emperor how the King touched with pittie at the invasion of Christian countries by the Turkes, would willingly ioinc with him and other States of the Empire (in case the Emperor could bring it to passe) in some league against the Turkes and against their confederats. But caution was giuen that he should not once mention the French King nor answere any mention made of him, only to say that his commission extended no further. But if the Emperor would send a messenger into England he should happily know more.

Herewith and because time beateth out truth letters were sent to Mr Pickering the Kinges Embassador in France to know whether Stukely had acquainted him with any of those matters which he had disclosed in England. And with what familiarity the French King vsed him or by what other circumstances he could conceiue his report to be true. Herewith also the Lord Gray was chosen deputy of Calais, & the Lord Wentworth remoued as one whose youth & want of experience, was held vsfit to gouerne that charge in turbulent times. On the other side S^r Nicholas Wentworth was remoued from being Porter of the towne by reason of his old age, but had an hundred pounds yearly pension assigned him for his life. Also by abating needlesse expences to be the better enabled against charge the seuerall tables for young Lords, for the masters of Requests, and for Sergeants at armes were laid downe, and diuerse extraordinary allowances were taken away. And further because the King was to make payment of 48000^l beyond the seas, and had but 14000^l towards the summe 300 of the chiefe Merchants aduenturers granted to him a loan of 40000^l for three moneths, to be leuiued from the cloaths which they were then to transport after the rate of 20 shillings for euery cloath. But these Aduenturers went not vpon any aduenture because at that shipping 40000 broad cloaths were by them transported.

Whilest these matters were in action two Lawyers arrived in England with direction from the French King to declare what matters had bene determined against the English by the French Kings counsell, and vpon what reasons and also what matters were then depending, and what care and diligence was vsed in those dispatches. They were much commended by all for their modest behaviour, and their sweet eloquence much delighted the King who againe in a short speech first thanked the French King for his desire to giue him satisfaction, then commended them for well performing their charge, but for the substance of their businesse he referred them to London, where some some of his counsell should commune thereof fully with them. Here M^r Secretary Peeter, and M^r Watton, and S^r Thomas Smith laid before them the grieuances of the English merchants, whose losses by the French exceeded the summe of 50000^l. To this the Embassadors gaue little answer, but said they would make report thereof at their returne into France, affirming that they had no commission but only to declare the manner and causes of iudiciall proceedings.

Presently after their returne Monsieur Villandry was sent againe in post to the King to declare vnto him that albeit M^r Sydneies, and M^r Winters matters went iustly against them, yet because they were the Kings seruants, and one of them in place neere his person, the French King was content freely to giue to M^r Sydney his ship and all his goods in her, and to M^r Winter his ship and all his owne goods. But this offer the King refused affirming that he required nothing freely, but expected iustice and expedition. Vilandry shewed further that the King his master was desirous that the ordinances and customes of England and France touching Marine affaires might be reduced into one forme, without any difference betweene them. Whereto answer was made that the English ordinances for marine affaires were no other then the ciuill lawes and certaine auntient additions of the Realme, wherein they could conceiue no reason or conuenikncy of change, hauing long continued without reproofe. After this Vilandry brought forth two proclamations not long before published in France and very aduantageable for the English, for the which he had a letter of thankses to the King his master. Lastly, which was indited the maine of his message, and whereto all other were but insinuations, he desired that certaine Frenchmen taken vpon the coast of England might be released. Hereto he receiued answer that they were Pirats, and that some of them should by iustice be punished, and some might happily by clemency be spared, so with this dispatch he returned for France.

But before it was conceiued he could be fully at home he came againe to the English court, and there declared to the King, how the King his master would deliuer 4 shippes against which iudgment had beene giuen. And that hee would appoint men of good sort and sufficiency to heare the English Merchants at Paris, and that he would alter his ordinances for marine affaires, of which emendations he then sent a copy to the King. The King appointed his Secretaries to consider therof. And after some passages of time Villandry had his answer. That the King intended not by receiuing fower ships freely to preiudice his right in the rest. That the appointing of an inferior counsell to heare Merchants at Paris after former tedious suits in a higher court, he thought would be but dilatory and so to little purpose, because the inferior counsell would neuer vndoe that (albeit good cause should appeare) which had bin iudged by a higher counsell. That the new ordinances he liked no better then he did the olde, and therefore desired no other then the customes which of late times had beene vsed in France, and then continued in force betweene England and the low countries. Lastly he desired no more words but deeds.

And now were letters returned from Mr Pickering out of France, whereby he aduertised the King how Strukely neuer discouered any of those speeches to him, which since he had charged vpon the French King. And further that he neuer was either in credite or conuersant with the French King or with the Constable, nor euer resorted vnto them except once when he was interpreter betweene the Constable & certaine English pioners, wherfore as it was very like so did he verily belieue that as the French King was alwaies close & referued amongst his best knowne friends, so would he not be open and vncircumspect to impart a matter of such import to a meere stranger and in a most vnseasonable time.

Hereupon Stukely was examined againe, and then finding it dangerous alike to confesse a truth or stand to a ly, he became more vnconstant and variable then he was before, wherefore he was committed to the Tower, and notice was giuen to the French Kings Embassador of all those proceedings, to the intent that he might acquaint his master with them. Letters were also sent to the Kings Embassador in France, directing him to aduertise the French King of all these matters, and that for two speciall ends. One to manifest the Kings confidence in his amity with France; the other to bring the French King into suspition against all English fugitiues who resorted daily to his court. And so because no better person was the author, incredible fables were not belieued. But hereupon some began to discourse that the accusations against the Duke of Somerset were no lesse improbable, and vpon the credit of no better persons, and therefore might happily be no lesse vntrue. But the difference is great betweene both the persons, and the facts of a soueraigne Prince and of a subiect.

And now when the French K. vnderstood aswell the imputation which Stukely had raised as his imprisonment. First he deeply protested his innocence in his particular and his generall sincere meaning for preserving amity with England. Then he much blamed Stukelies villany, and nolesse thanked the King aswell for that he had not afforded a credulous eare to such mischeiuous devises, wherein the tender touch of his estate might happily haue excused his error as for his Princely manner in acquainting him therewith.

On the other side when M^r Morrison the Kings Embassador with the Emperor, had opened the matters giuen him in charge, touching a league against the Turke, and against his confederats. The Emperor much thanked the King for his gentle offer, and promised to procure the Regent to send ouer some persons of credite to understand the Kings further meaning. Soone after M^r Thomas Grosbham came from Antwerp into England, and declared to the counsell how Mounſier Lougie the Emperors Treafurer in Flanders was ſent to him from the Regent with a packet of letters which the Burgundians had intercepted in Bullonois ſent as it was ſaid from the Dowager of Scotland, wherein ſhe ſet forth how ſhe had imprifoned George Paris an Irishman becauſe ſhe vnderſtood that vpon grant of his pardon he had a meaning to come into England, and how ſhe had ſent Oconners ſonne into Ireland to giue encouragement to the Irish Lords. Alſo he ſhewed inſtructions giuen about 4 years before vpon the fall of the Admirall of France, to a gentleman then coming from England, that if any were in England of the Admiralls faction he ſhould doe his beſt to excite a trouble.

The deputy of Ireland was at that time ready to transport into England. But vpon this aduertifement Sr Henry Knowles was ſent in poſt to ſtay him there, yet with caution that he ſhould pretend to ſtay vpon his owne occaſions, and therevpon deferred his departure from weeke to weeke, leaſt the true reaſon ſhould be diſcerned. Letters of thanks were alſo ſent to the Regent for this gentle ouerture. And the meſſenger was directed to uſe pleaſing words in the deliuey of the letter, and to wiſh a further amity betweene the two ſtates. And further to acquaint her with the French Kings praſiſe in waging 5000 Scottiſh footmen, and 500 horſemen, & how he tooke vp 100000^l by exchange at Lubecke, whereby the coniecture was evident that he had ſome meaning againſt the Emperor in the ſpring then next following. Doubtleſſe the aduertifement of neighbour Princes are alwaies much to be regarded, for that they receiue intelligence from better Authors & ſurer grounds then perſons of inferior note and ſort.

About this time one of the Earle of Tyrones men was committed to the tower for making an vntrue complaint againſt the deputy and counſell of Ireland. And for bruting abroad how the Duke of Northumberland and the

Earle

Earle of Pembroke were fallen into quarrell, and one of them against the other in the field.

In April in the 6th yeare of the raigne of the King, he fell sicke of the Measles, wherof in short time he well recovered, afterwards he sickned of the small poxe, which breaking kindly from him, was thought would proue a means to cleanse his body from such vnhealthfull humors as commonly occasion long sicknesse or death. And herof he also so perfectly recovered that in the summer next following he rode his progresse with greater magnificence then euer before. For whether it were to maintaine his maiesty or to manifest the feare which had beene formerly impressed, he caried with him a band of 320 men, which made vp his whole traine about the number of 4000 horse. But because this multitude was burthensome to the Country through which he passed, which did afford little meadow or pasture, because also it seemed to bewray distrust as if the King should thinke that he rather marched among dangerous rebels then tooke his pleasure among faithfull and quiet disposed subjects, about the middest of his progresse the greatest part was discharged. For furnishing the charge of this progresse 500 pound weight of gold was coined with 1500 pounds sterling.

Soone after the King did complaine of a continuall infirmity of body, yet rather as an indisposition in health then any set sicknesse.

And about that time certaine prodigies were seene either as messengers or signes of some imminent and eminent euill. At Middleton eleuen miles from Oxford a woman brought forth a female child which had two bodies from the nauill vpward, so vnited at the nauill as when they were laid in length the one stretched directly opposite to the other, from the nauill downward it was but one, it liued weakly 18 daies, and then both bodies died together. Vpon birth of such monsters the Grecians, and after them the Romans did vse diuerse sorts of expiations, and to goe about their principall citties, with many solemne ceremonies and sacrifices, supposing hereby that wrath from heaven was menaced against them. At Quinborough three great Dolphins were taken, and a few daies following at Blackwall sixe, which were brought to London, the least in bignesse exceeding any horse. After this, three great fishes were taken at Grauesend called Whirlepooles and drawen vpon the Kings bridge at Westminster. These accidents the more rarely they happen, the more ominous are they commonly esteemed, either because they are so indeed or because they are neuer obserued but when sad euent doe ensue.

In Ianuary about the beginning of the 7th yeare of the Kings raigne his sicknesse did more apparently shew it selfe, especially by the symptome of a tough strong streining cough. All the medicines and diet which could be prescribed together with the helpes both of his yong age, and of the rising time of the yeare, were so farre either from curing or abating his griefe, that it daily encreased by dangerous degrees, & it was not only a violence of the cough that did infect him, but therewith a weaknesse and faintnes of spirit, which shewed plainly that his vitall parts were most strongly and strangely assaulted, and the talke hereof among the people was so much the more because through an opinion obscurely raised but running as most absurd, that his sicknesse grew by a slow working poison. Vpon this cause it happened that a Parliament beginning vpon the first day of March was vpon the last of the same moneth dissolved.

And now the danger of the Kings sicknesse was much lamented, not only by his owne people but by strangers abroad, because his curtesy and wisdom had begot to him such loue, that he was no lesse honoured by those who heard of him, then of those who conversed with him. For he was famous in all places by reason of his foresight and judgment in affaires, and did so well temper the greatnes of his estate both with modestie and with grauitie, that he auoided enuie by the one, and contempt by the other. Some compared him with the greatest persons that had beene, both for warre and peace, because in the like pitch of yeares, none of them attained to the like perfections. Haply hee did not appeare in souldiery so great, but that was because he was not so rash, being also drawne backe from his pursutes abroad by domesticall disorders and diuisions, both amongst the people and Nobilitie of his Realme, by reason whereof he scarce seemed well settled in his Chaire of Estate, and yet his fortunes were alwayes Victorious.

It hapned during his sicknesse that Doctor Ridley Bishop of London, preached before him, and in his Sermon much commended workes of charitie, which as they were a dutie for all men to performe, so most especially for men in most especiall dignitie and place, as well in regard of their large abilities, as for that they were much obliged to giue examples of goodnesse to others: the same day after dinner the King sent for him priuately into the Gallery at White-Hall, caused him to sit in a chaire by him, would not permit him to remaine vncovered, and then after courteous thanks, he reported all the principall points of his Sermon, and further added; I tooke my selfe to be especially touched by your speech, as well in regard of the abilities which God hath giuen me, as in regard of the example, which from mee hee will require, for as in the Kingdome I am next vnder God, so must I most neerely approach to him in goodnesse and in mercie, for as our miseries stand most in need from him, so are we the greatest debtors; debtors to all that are miserable and shall be the greatest accomptants of our dispensation therein. And therefore, my Lord, as you haue giuen me (I thanke you) this generall exhortation, so direct me, I intreat you, by what particular actions I may this way best discharge my dutie.

The Bishop partly astonished, and partly ouerjoyed with these speeches, was stricke into a sad silence for a time, at last teares and words breaking forth together, he declared to the King, so as he little expected such a question; so was he not furnished with a present answer, for this matter had a great mixture of a ciuill gouernment, wherein he conceiued that the Citizens of London had best experience, as ouerburthened with multitudes of poore, not only of their owne, but from all parts of the Realme besides, and therefore as they best know both the qualitie of such people, and the inconueniences which they occasion, so could they best aduise what remedies were fittest: wherefore, if the King were pleased to afford his Letters to that effect, he would confer with them, and in very short time returne with answer. The King forthwith caused his Letters to be written, and would not suffer the Bishop to depart vntill hee had firmed them with his hand and Signet, and enioyned the Bishop to be the messenger, imposing great charge for expedition. The Bishop halted with his Letters to the Lord Maior, who presently assembled certaine Aldermen, and foure and twentie Commissioners, by whose aduice the poore were cast into three companies and sorts, some were poore by impotencie of nature, as young fatherlesse children, old decrepit persons, Ideots, Criples and such like; others are poore by facultie, as wounded souldiers, diseased and sicke persons, and the like; the third sort are the poore by idlenesse or vnthriftinesse, as riotous spenders, vagabonds, loyterers, lewd strumpets and their companions; that the first of these were to be educated and maintained, the second to be cured and releued, and the third to be chastised and reduced to good order.

When this was presented to the King, he gaue to the Citie for education and maintenance of the first sort of poore, the Gray-Friers Church neere Newgate-market, with all the reuenues thereto belonging; for cure and releefe of the second sort, he gaue Saint Bartholomewes neere Smithfield; for correction of the third, hee appointed his house at Bridewell, the ancient Mansion of many English Kings, and which which not long before had been repaired and beautified by Henry the eighth, for the entertainment of the great Emperour Charles the fifth, for increase of maintenance of their places, together with the new re-edified Hospitall of Saint Thomas in Southwark, the King gaue seven hundred and fifty markes yearly out of the rents of the Hospitall of Saint John Baptist, or the Sauoy, with all the bedding and furniture at that time belonging to that place, and when the charter of this gift was presented vnto him with a blanke space for lands to be afterwards receiued in Mortmaine, to a yearly valew without further licence, the King presently with his owne hand filled vp the void space with these words (foure thousand markes by yeare) this done with reuerent gesture and speech, he thanked God for prolonging his life to finish that businesse; and so hee was the first Founder of those three pious workes, which by many additions are now growne to be the most absolute and famous of that kinde in Europe.

The Kings sicknesse daily increased, and so did the Duke of *Northumberland*s diligence about him; for he was little absent from the King, and had alwayes some well assured to espie how the state of his health changed euery houre, and the more ioyfull hee was at the heart, the more sorrowfull appearance did he outwardly make, whether any tokens of poyson did appeare, reports are various, certainly his Physicians discerned an inuincible malignitie in his disease, and the suspicion did the more increase, for that the complaint being chiefly from the lights, a part as of no quicke sense, so no seat for any sharpe disease, yet his sicknesse towards the end grew highly extrenie; but the Duke regarded not much the muttering multitude, knowing right well that rumours grow stale and vanish with time, and yet somewhat either to abate or delay them, for the present, hee caused speeches to be spread abroad, that the King was well recovered in health, which was readily beleued, as most desired to be true.

Hereupon all persons expressed ioy in their countenance and speech, which they enlarged by telling the newes to others whom they incountred, who haply had heard it often before, and as the report increased, so therewith increased also the ioy: Thus whilest euery man beleeued, and no man knew, it was made more credible by religious persons, who openly in Churches gaue publike thanks for the Kings recovery.

But when the speech of his danger was againe reuiued, and as in newes it happeneth, the more stopped, the more increased to the worse, then as if the second time he had beene lost, the people did immoderately breake forth into passions, complaining, that for this cause his two Vncles had beene taken away, for this cause the most faithfull of his Nobilitie and of his Councell were disgraced and removed from Court; this was the reason that such were placed next his person, who were most assuredly disposed either to commit or permit any mischiefe, that then it did appeare, that it was not vainly coniectured some yeares before by men of iudgement and fore-sight, that after Somersets death the King should not long enioy his life. To qualifie these and some broader speeches, it was thought conuenient that the King sometimes should shew himselfe abroad, albeit, little either with his pleasure or for his health, yet a thing which in long consuming sicknesses, euen to the last period of life, men are often able to doe.

Whilest the King remained thus grievously sicke, diuers notable mariages were solemnized at once in Durham place, The Lord Gulaford, fourth sonne to the Duke of Northumberland, married Lady Iane, the Duke of Suffolkes eldest daughter, by Francis daughter to L. Mary second sister to King Henry the eighth: also the Earle of Pembrokes eldest sonne married the Lady Katherine, the Duke of Suffolkes eldest daughter by the said Lady Francis, who then was liuing: and Martin Kyes, Gentleman Porter, married Maria the third daughter of the Duke of Suffolke, by the said Lady Lady Frances: lastly, the Lord Hastings, some to the Earle of Huntington, tooke to wife Katherine youngest daughter to the Duke of Northumberland; hereupon the common people vpon a disposition to interpret all *Northumberland*s actions to the worst, lest nothing vnspoken which might serue to stirre their hatred against the Duke, or pitie towards the King: but the Duke was nothing moued hereat, for being equally obstinate both in purpose and desire, and mounting his hopes about the pitch of reason, he resolued then to dissemble no longer, but began openly to play his game.

For albeit the Lady Iane married to his fourth sonne, had not right to the succession of the Crowne, for that shee was excluded, first, by the two Ladies Mary and Elizabeth, daughters of King Henry the eighth; next, by the issue of Lady Margret married into Scotland, eldest sister to King Henry the eighth: lastly, by her owne mother, the Ladie Fraunce, who then was liuing, yet Northumberland, sottishly inuad with ouer great fortune, procured the King by his Letters Patents vnder the great Seale of England, to appoint the Lady Iane to succeed him in the inheritance of the Crowne; in this contriuaunce he vsed the aduice of two especially, Lord chiefe Iustice Montague, who drew the Letters Patents, and Secretary Cecil: these furnished the Patent with diuers reasons, whercof some were of Law and some of policie in State: The pretensions of Law were these, that albeit the Crowne of the Realme, by an Act of the five and thirtieth of King Henry the eighth, was in default of his issue of his body, and of the body of Edward his sonne lawfully begotten, limited to remaine to the Lady Mary, his eldest daughter, and to the heires of her body lawfully begotten; and in default of such issue, the remainder thereon to the Lady Elizabeth, his second daughter; and to the heires of her body lawfully begotten, vnder such conditions as should be limited by the said King vnder his Letters Patents, vnder the great Seale, or by his last Will in writing, signed with his hand; yet because the said limitations were made to persons illegitimate, both the marriages between King Henry the eighth and their severall mothers, being vndone by sentences of divorce, and the severall divorcements ratified by authoritie of Parliament in the eight and thirtieth yeare of King Henry the eighth, which Act remained then in force, both the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth were thereby disabled to claime the Crowne, or any honours or hereditaments as heires to King Edward the sixth or any other person.

And againe, the said two Ladies, Mary and Elizabeth, being but of the halfe bloud to King Edward, albeit they had beene borne in lawfull matrimony, yet by the ancient Lawes of the Realme they were not inheritable to him by descent, and had no capacitie in any degree to receive any inheritance from him.

The reasons or pretexts of necessitie to the State were these: In case the Ladie Mary and the Lady Elizabeth should enjoy the Crowne, they would assuredly ioyne in marriage with some stranger, who would reduce this noble and free Realme into the servitude of the Bishop of Rome, and thereby bring in forren customes and Lawes, abolishing those whereupon the rights of all native subiects depend, and haply the whole body of the Realme should hereby be annexed as a member to some other greater Kingdome, to the vtter subuersion of the ancient dignitie and Estate thereof, the people were not vnlike to elect a King of some priuate Stocke, a popular and seditious man, peradventure one who to countenance his owne vnworthinesse and obscurity, would little regard what contumely he cast vpon the falling Family of the Kings before him; wherefore he held it the most provident aduice, that the King by his authoritie should designe, not only his next Successour, but others also in reuersion, that the Crowne might not be subiect to rising, but remaine to those whom hee loved, and who humoured him best.

These reasons did more easily sinke into the Kings iudgement, ment, partly by meanes of the great affection which he bare to the Religion that he had estab^dlished, of the change whereof he was assuredly perswaded in case the Lady Mary his sister should succeed, and partly by reason of the entire loue hee bare to his Cosin the Ladie Jane, a woman of most rare and incomparable perfections: For besides her excellent beautie adorned with all varietie of vertues, as a cleere skie with starres, as a princely Diadem with Iewels, shee was most deare to the King in regard both of her religion and of her education in the knowledge of the liberall Sciences, and skill in Languages, for in Theologie, in Philosophie, in all liberall Arts, in the Latine and Greeke tongues, and in the Vulgar Languages of diuers neere Nations; shee farre exceeded all of her sex, and any of her yeares, vnlesse haply the King himselfe.

Hereupon the King consented that Letters Patents should be drawne, importing that in case the King should die without issue of his bodie lawfully begotten, then the Imperiall Crowne of England and Ireland, with his title to the Crown of France, and all things to them belonging should remaine and come to the eldest sonne of the Ladie Frances, daughter to the Ladie Mary, youngest sister to Henry the eighth, in case such issue should be borne into the world, during the life of King Edward, and after to the heires male of the said issue, and in like sort from sonne to sonne of the said Ladie Frances lawfully begotten, as they should be in prioritie of birth, and borne during the Kings life; and in default of such sonnes and of heires male of every such sonne lawfully begotten, that then the said Crowne and all the premises should remaine and come to the Ladie Jane, eldest daughter to the said Ladie Frances, and the heires males of her lawfully begotten, and for default of such issue, the said Crowne to remaine to the Ladie Katherine, second daughter to the said Ladie Frances, with diuers other remainders, ouer which as they were vainly appointed, so are they needlesse to be repeated.

These Letters were dated the one and twentieth of June, in the seventh yeare of King Edwards raign, and by him signed when he was in great debilitie of body, and afterwards passed vnder the great Scale of England. And albeit the course contriuance was almost visible, first, for that such prouision was made for the Issue male of the said Lady Frances, who neither at that time had any, and was commonly reputed to be past yeares of child-bearing: secondly, for that in case, that beyond the ordinary course of nature, she should conceive, the hope was desperate that the King should liue vntill the birth.

Lastly, for that her children borne, and to be borne, were so carefully and orderly remembred, and no mention made of her selfe, from whom their title must be deriued, yet these Letters were subscribed by all the Priuie Counsellours, the greatest part both of number and power of the Nobilitie of the Realme, the Bishops, the Kings learned Councill, and all the Iudges at the Common Law, except only Sir James Halles, one of the Iustices of the Common Pleas, a man well obserued to be both religious and vpright, who worthily refused to subscribe, and was vnworthily requited by Queene Mary afterwards.

It is very like that some of these were guided with respect of their particular interest, for that they were possessed of diuers lands which once pertained to Monasteries, Chantries, and other religious houses not long before dissolued, of these they held themselues in some danger to lose; in case religion should change to the ancient forme, which by succession of Queene Mary they did euidently fore-see.

Others were drawne partly by feare, and partly by obligation to the Duke of Northumberland, who then was exceeding potent, and almost absolute in gouernment of the State, and supposed able to make any title good, either by his authoritie, or by his sword.

Now whether a King may lawfully dispose by his will, or otherwise, of a Kingdome that hath beene long carried in our forme of succession contrary to that ancient forme: I have largely discoursed in my History of the three Norman Kings, about the beginning of the raigne of King William the second; but certaine it is, that when kingdomes have customably beene carried by right of succession, according to proximity of blood, the violation of which course hath alwayes beene either very vaine, or with dangerous consequence, it hath alwayes beene like the breaking of a band which holdeth a sheafe of arrowes together, like a rupture in bankes, which bindeth a river within its proper channell, or like a casting downe of a pale, wherewith deere or other beasts are inclosed: It was neuer done, but either no effect ensued, or bloudie disorders, or haply both, and the Duke by piercing his ambitious purposes with his vnjust policie, did no otherwise than often doth a foolish greedie gambler, who by stealing a card to win a stake, forfeits the whole rest.

But having thus in his owne opinion assured his owne denices, nothing remained but that the King should not longer survive, lest haply his sickly judgement might be overruled by sounder aduice; his disease was violent, but his Physicians conceiued some hope of recovery, in case he might be remoued to change of healthfull aire, which in infirmities of the vitall parts, the seat of his sicknesse, is of greatest moment for the cure.

But hereto the Councell would not consent, so he continued without either any sensible mending, or impairing for a time. At the last a Gentlewoman, vnworthy to be named, but accounted to be a schoole-mistresse for the purpose, offered her seruice assuredly to cure him, in case he were committed wholly to her hand; hereto the Physicians would in no case afford their aduice, because as she could giue no reason, either of the nature of the disease, or of the part afflicted, so shee would not declare the meanes whereby shee intended to worke the cure.

After some shew of deliberation among the Councell, it was resolved that the Physicians should be discharged, and the cure committed to her alone: the apparant defect both of her iudgement and experience, ioyned to the weightinesse of the aduenture, caused many to maruell, and some deeply to suspect that shee was but an instrument of mischief; this surmise was strongly confirmed within a very short time ensuing, when the King did fall into desperate extremities, his vitall parts were mortally stuffed, which brought him to a difficultie of speech and of breath, his legs swelled, his pulse failed, his skin changed colour, and many other horrid symptomes appeared.

Then were the Physicians called againe, who espying him in that fearefull estate, departed from him with a sad silence, leaving him to the miserable mercy of neere approaching death, some of these whispered among their primate friends, that they were called for fashion only, but neither their aduice nor appliances were any deale regarded, but the King had beene ill dealt with more than once, and that when by the benefit, both of his youth and of carefull meanes, there was faire means of his recovery, he was againe more strongly overlaid.

Yet as crueltie and wrong neuer stand secure, so the Duke thought one thing more expedient for assuring his designes, and that was to draw the Lady Mary wholly into his power: to this purpose Letters were directed to her in the Kings name from the Councell, willing her forth with to resort to the King, as well to be a comfort to him in his sickness, as to see all matters well ordered about him; the Ladies suspecting no lurking mischief, addressed her selfe with all speed to the iourney, expressing great ioy, that either her company or her seruice, should be esteemed needfull to the King; but as she was vpon the way, and within halfe a daies iourney of London, her foot readie to slip into the snare, shee receiued aduice both of the Kings desperate estate, and of the Dukes designments against her: whereupon she returned in haste to her house at Houerden, where in a short time shee heard how vnprofitable her iourney would haue beent to London.

So the King hauing long wraffled with a lingring and tormenting sicknesse, at the last his spirits yeelded to the malice of his disease, which as with great patience hee did endure, so with nolesse pietie did he end it; many seruent prayers hee made, both for himselfe and for the people of his Realmes, and some when he was esteemed almost past sense, and so spent his last breath in committing his sweet soule into the Almightyes hands which had created it.

Hedied at Greenwich vpon Thursday the sixth day of July, in the yeare 1553. and in the sixteenth yeare of his age, when he had raigned six yeares, five moneths and nine dayes; two dayes his death was concealed, to open a straight way for the Dukes crooked purposes; his body was buried vpon the ninth of August in the same yeare, in the Chappell of Saint Peters Church in Westminster, and laid neere to the body of
